During the history of our country we have had only three generals of the Army. They were appointed after the Civil War. Gens. Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan were the only ones thus honored. During the period after the formation of our Government, when we began to have trouble with France, Congress created the grade of lieutenant general of the Army. It was understood that Gen. George Washington was to be appointed to that grade, and, as a matter of fact, when the law was passed President Adams sent in to the Senate the nomination of Gen. Washington as lieutenant general of the Army. He was promptly confirmed, and the then Secretary of War, Gen. McHenry, took the commission personally to Mount Vernon and there delivered it to Gen. Washington, who was then working out in his fields. In accepting the commission Gen. Washington gave utterance to a thought that I believe ought to be indelibly impressed upon the mind of every child of this country. He said, "I am ready for any service I can give to my country." [Applause.] That was the spirit that actuated Gen. Pershing and all of the officers and men of his command who went to Europe to fight this war for our country. The first thing that Gen. Pershing did that was of great importance to the American forces was to insist that his forces should fight as an American Army. Both the French and English demanded that our soldiers be used as replacement troops. In other words, if they had gone into a battle and five or six thousand of their soldiers were killed or wounded, we were to immediately furnish the requisite number of men to fight under their generals as replacement troops.

From the beginning Gen. Pershing fought that proposition. Not only the high command of the French and the high command of the British forces insisted that this procedure should be adopted by us, but the statesmen of those two countries took the same position. Gen. Pershing finally said that we would fight as an American Army if we fought at all. He gained his point, and by fighting as an American Army our soldiers brought the war materially to a speedier conclusion. [Applause.]

Gen. Pershing had been in Europe but a few months when he began to realize that the only way to bring the war to a speedy conclusion was to hammer and hammer away continually and never give the enemy a chance to dig in. He, therefore, sent a cable to this country in October, 1917, urging that the men of our forces be trained for open warfare, not for trench warfare. He urged rifle-fire training and the use of the bayonet, for he saw that the Germans were mortally afraid of bayonet charges. He knew that the Americans would shine if they were to be allowed to use the bayonet upon the enemy when they came in close contact. That course, as suggested by Gen. Pershing, was followed, and the result was that when the American armies began their forward movements they never gave the Germans a chance to dig into trenches. That was another reason that contributed to the speedy termination of the war. [Applause.]

Gen. Pershing had been on the other side but a few months when he realized that it was important that the enemy be driven out of the St. Mihiel salient. The plan to accomplish such a result was formulated by the Americans as early as September, 1917. Pershing was not able to carry it into immediate effect. He had not the necessary troops. We were in that neighborhood at Toul, training, getting ready. But after the Chauteau-Thierry fight he undertook to carry out the plans that he and his staff officers had formulated for the St. Mihiel drive.

I want to say that when that plan was submitted, as it had to be submitted, to the French high command the latter did not alter in any particular the plan that was made by the Americans. The St. Mihiel fight was carried out to a successful issue according to those plans. In 27 hours Gen. Pershing and his army drove out the enemy, who had occupied that territory for practically four years. Thousands of the allied troops had lost their lives in trying to take portions of that salient. They were unsuccessful; but under the plans of Gen. Pershing we secured a substantial victory in that region, which caused the enemy to retire from a large extent of territory he had theretofore been holding against terrific but unsuccessful drives of the allied forces.

After Sir Douglas Haig had made his despairing cry to the British Army to stand with their backs to the wall, during the March drive in 1918, and when Lloyd-George made his memorable speech in Parliament stating how serious was the situation on the French front, Gen. Pershing went to England for a conference. We were told that reinforcements were badly needed if we hoped to save the situation, and that it was necessary to send over our troops as speedily as possible. After the interview in England, occurred what is known as the Abbeville conference in France. At that conference Gen. Pershing agreed to get over the American soldiers if Great Britain would furnish the ships, and it was by reason of that agreement that England furnished the ships. We began to take over forces of American soldiers to such an extent that two months later they were arriving in France at the rate of no less than 10,000 men a day. [Applause.] Gen. Pershing had performed a very important work in bringing about that agreement for the use of British ships by this country. While Gen. Pershing insisted on fighting his men as an American Army, when the great German drive from the Aisne began, in May, 1918, which brought the Germans to the Marne, he did not hesitate in turning over for the use of the French high command every American division that could be sent to that important front.

Thus the First, the Second, the Third, and, I believe, the Forty-second Divisions of the American Expeditionary Forces all went forward after the 18th of July and helped to drive the Germans out of that territory and far toward the boundary of their own country. Gen. Pershing cooperated in every way he could with the allied forces. It was his foresight, his prescience, that enabled him to realize the advantages that must ensue by cooperating in every way possible with the allied armies. It is hardly necessary to recall the fact that our divisions were neither fully trained nor fully equipped for that service, so that the results attained by our men were all the more wonderful.

It is needless to tell the details of the Meuse-Argonne fight. It was hammer and push and hammer again that drove the enemy from those regions. The allied nations were war weary. Their soldiers had been operating for four long years. They had exhibited marvelous courage and fortitude, but they were tired out, and it is probable that they never could have accomplished what the Americans accomplished in the Meuse-Argonne fight. All that one has to do is to go through that area and see the terrible character of the terrain over which our armies operated. But they were dauntless, they were fearless, and they were determined to bring the issue to an end. Gen. Pershing's training and ability as a commander contributed largely to the successful result of their efforts. [Applause.]

I want to say, too, that Gen. Pershing is a man of deep feeling and sympathy and consideration for his men. The wounded were his constant concern. All through the war he made every effort to see that those men who had fallen in battle were taken care of in hospitals to the best possible advantage. Every convenience was afforded them. He often found time to visit them. Everything that could be done for their comfort was done. Gen. Pershing made it a point to investigate those matters personally and see to it that the wounded men and officers and the sick men and officers of our Army should be given every care and attention.

I was present at Ancy-le-Franc when I heard this splendid officer address the Eightieth Division. I wish every American citizen could have heard it. It was the utterance of a plain soldier and was full of advice to his men in respect to their demeanor as citizens, as civilians, after the war was over and they were demobilized. I was surprised to find that this man who was not given to public speaking could express himself so readily and so admirably, and that the advice he gave was so full of splendid Americanism. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, my time is almost up, and I will not burden the House any longer at this time. I shall ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, but I feel, in closing, that I want to say this, that we as Members of this House should say to him on his return, "Welcome home, Gen. Pershing. You have honored your country, and your countrymen delight in honoring you." [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I will yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if it would be considered improper to name the gentleman who is to be appointed to this honor?

Mr KAHN. I will say to the gentleman that in framing the bill I looked up all the laws that have been passed by the Congress in cases where the grades of general of the Army and of lieutenant general were created and I found that never in any law that was passed by Congress has the name been used.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will permit, the President submitted in his message that he would name Gen. John J. Pershing.

Mr. KAHN. In addition to that, after I introduced the bill in this form, I went to the White House and saw one of the President's secretaries and told him that a controversy had arisen as to whether the officer should be named or not in the proposed legislation. I called attention to the fact that where Congress at one time endeavored to insert a name in this kind of legislation, President Arthur had vetoed the bill on the ground that it was trenching upon the President's prerogative. The President wrote me a letter in reply, in which he said that he intended, of course, to name Gen. Pershing, and he hoped any bill that was passed would provide that he should rank every other officer in the Army. [Applause.] So the gentleman will find a provision in this bill which puts Gen. Pershing ahead of the Chief of Staff and every other officer in the Army. So that proposition is taken care of in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in honoring Gen. Pershing we are but following the course pursued by the allied countries in showing proper appreciation of the services rendered by their great military leaders. The ovations tendered by the populaces of Paris, London, and Rome to our commander in chief attest the fact that the peoples of the allied nations fully recognize the splendid ability and the great worth of this American soldier. The passage of this bill will afford his own countrymen an opportunity to show him that we are not behind the nations of Europe in honoring one who has shown us, through his many years of service in the Army of his country, in the Indian campaigns, in the Spanish-American War, in the Philippines, on the Mexican border, and at Colonia Dublan, that the American officer is always ready to meet any emergency that affects his country's welfare. While we are not a military Nation, the lives of such officers as Gen. Pershing have always shed luster on the pages of our country's history.

Mr. CAMBPELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman from North Carolina use some time?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, following precedents which the Committee on Military Affairs believes should be adhered to, does not name the officer who is to receive the title of General of the Armies of the United States, but on June 18 of this year the President recommended legislation which would authorize the appointment of John Joseph Pershing to the permanent rank of general, and that distinguished officer is as definitely recognized as the recipient of the honor proposed to be conferred as though he were named in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, others have spoken eloquently of the long, varied, important, and distinguished services of this great soldier. They have refreshed our recollection of his gallant service in many fields, and particularly as the commander of that magnificent force of the soldiers of the Republic who broke the advancing lines of the enemy, turned the tide of battle, and became the deciding factor in the winning of the World War.

But, Mr. Speaker, while others speak of Pershing the soldier, I desire in the moment allotted to me to speak of Pershing the man, the citizen. It is a matter for congratulation that in the bestowal of the highest military honor in connection with the World War there is unanimous agreement from the President to the humblest member of our military forces as to the man whose military service entitles him to this distinction. May I suggest that it is equally a matter for congratulation that the man on whom this honor is to be bestowed is as worthy as a man and a citizen as he is as a military leader, and that he represents those personal virtues which mark the highest and best type of a citizen of the Republic.

He was a normal, wholesome boy, still lovingly remembered as "Johnnie Pershing" by the people of the little Missouri town where he was born and lived in his early youth. He was a dutiful and affectionate son, a kind and loving husband. He is a faithful and considerate father. He has been at all times a good citizen, who in this devotion to his profession has not lost interest in the problems of citizenship. To those who have been fortunate enough to know him he has been a faithful and devoted friend.

It is a fortunate thing for the Republic that the man who is to receive the distinguished honor proposed in the measure before us, as a recognition of his great service to his country and of the service of the gallant men who fought under him, should be such a man as the good people of the Republic delight to honor. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. I desire to ask the Speaker how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 12 minutes and he has 18 minutes remaining.

Mr. POU. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] 10 minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I hope this resolution conferring the rank of permanent general on Gen. John J. Pershing will pass without a dissenting voice. We are all proud of him as a great American. Missourians are especially proud of him because his eyes first opened upon the glories of the world in imperial Missouri.

First and last I have made four or five speeches in this House about lieutenant generals whenever we had the question up. I have always insisted, and I insist now, that the rank of lieutenant general and of full general should be bestowed by a special act of Congress only on men who have distinguished themselves in the military service of the country. [Applause.] Extraordinary rank is an extraordinary honor and should be bestowed for extraordinary service. Gen. Grant was made lieutenant general with succession to Sherman; afterwards changed to extend to Sheridan. They all filled the position of lieutenant general, and all three of them filled the position of full general. Gen. Sheridan was made a full general when he was on his deathbed. After him we never had another permanent general. The rank of full general as a temporary rank has been bestowed on two generals in this war. The rank of lieutenant general was resurrected for Gen. Schofield on the theory that he was the only Union soldier then living who had commanded an army in the field. Then Gen. Miles had been wanting to be a lieutenant general for a long time, and finally we made him lieutenant general and tried to limit the rank to him, on the theory that it should be bestowed only on men of great services. But we could not do it. So he was made lieutenant general. The machinery for continuing the lieutenant generals was put in the bill, and we had four or five lieutenant generals in succession, and then they ran out of generals who had won any particular distinction anywhere. If you can use the term "gravitating up," they had "gravitated up" to be commanders of the Army.

So Gen. Grosvenor and myself, and a lot of us, went into a logrolling scheme here one day and limited the rank of lieutenant general to men who served in the Civil War. That is the way we stopped it. Washington during the Revolution was commander of the American Army and a lieutenant general in the French establishment by appointment of Louis XVI. During our troubles with France, after quitting the Presidency he was made lieutenant general with authority to appoint his subordinate major generals and brigadiers. After the Mexican War, Winfield Scott was made brevet lieutenant general. During the Mexican War a bill passed the House to resurrect the grade of lieutenant general, and Col. Thomas Hart Benton, "The Great Missourian," was to receive the appointment; but the bill failed in the Senate by three votes.

Gen. Pershing commanded more soldiers than any other American has ever commanded in the history of the world or, in all human probability, ever will command. I hope we will never have any use for any such big Army any more, and so does every man who has any sense or patriotism. That he did his duty faithfully and well there is no question.

It is a rather interesting, though little, fact that he got into West Point only 22 days before he would have been too old. That was a very narrow margin on which to get opportunity for a very great career. Like a great many other men of distinction, not so many in the Army as in the civil walks of life, he had been a school-teacher out in Missouri. One of the best places for the development of American talent and manhood that can be found anywhere is teaching a country school. [Applause.] And he did it.

It is also an interesting fact that he and Gen. Crowder were born and reared in the same congressional district in Missouri.

Gen. Pershing enjoys the distinction which I am not certain any other American general ever had, of having commanded troops and having fought on three continents—America, Europe, and Asia. I do not suppose there is anything that would ever inveigle him down into Africa, although it may be. Americans are proud of him. They want to bestow on him the highest honor that is possible under our military system. It is universally admitted that he discharged his duties well.

Of the small number of lieutenant generals Missouri furnished three—Sherman, Schofield, and Bates. Of four full permanent generals two—Grant and Pershing—have lived in Missouri—Grant for three or four years, Pershing all his life. Gen. Grant was made a brigadier while camped at Mexico, Mo., in my congressional district, and his wife was a Missouri woman.

Of course, the manner of fighting has changed so much in recent years that it is impossible to compare one of the generals of this war with the great captains of former times, and I shall not undertake it. But we honor ourselves in honoring this splendid American soldier. [Applause.]

I have a theory that I love to preach and promulgate, and which I believe is the gospel truth, that the average American rises equal to any emergency in which he finds himself placed. [Applause.] I do not think there is any doubt but that there were a great many men in this vast Army that we had in Europe that would have made shining reputations if the opportunity had afforded. I have no sort of doubt that there were colonels, lieutenant colonels, majors, captains, and lieutenants, sergeants, corporals, and privates that would have commanded an army successfully if they had had a chance. [Applause.] But they did not get the opportunity. Whether it was sheer good luck or what it was that gave Gen. Pershing his high command, I will not undertake to say. But he got it, and having attained it in Mexico and in the Philippines and in Europe, he has discharged his duties to the entire satisfaction of the American people. And I repeat that we honor ourselves in honoring him. [Loud applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has mentioned the fact that Gen. Pershing came near being beyond the eligible age when he was named as a cadet at West Point. In this connection it may be interesting for the House to know that the Member of Congress who named Gen. Pershing as a cadet at West Point was a Representative from the old tenth congressional district of Missouri, of which my home county, Daviess, was a part. The Rev. Joseph H. Burroughs, of Harrison County, represented that district in this House in the Forty-seventh Congress, having been elected as a Greenbacker in 1880. He was a Baptist preacher and a farmer. He died only about a year ago, after a long life well spent, and honored by a host of friends in my congressional district. He was an esteemed constituent of mine. We were warm personal friends. I mention as an interesting circumstance that this man, a preacher of the gospel, who was elected to the Congress as a Greenbacker, shaped the career of the great man whom we undertake to honor by this legislation. In common with the entire delegation from Missouri I shall support this bill, the purpose of which is to do honor to one of Missouri's most distinguished sons, Gen. John J. Pershing. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have always said we never should confer the rank of general upon any man except for conspicuous service in the field, and I am proud as one American to do honor to one who, I believe, has rendered the most conspicuous military service in the history of America.

Gen. Pershing did more to enforce a condition which enabled America to fight under an all-American Army on the other side than any other living man. It was not the purpose of the European nations to permit Americans to fight an all-American Army. They wanted American soldiers merged in the armies of the Allies. But Gen. Pershing stood as adamant against such a proposition and finally won. [Applause.]

To-day the victory achieved over Germany is due to the fact that America had an all-American Army fighting at Chateau-Thierry and Argonne-Meuse under the gallant leadership of Gen. John J. Pershing, the commander in chief of the American Army there. [Applause.]

Gen. Pershing is a great American. He is a great soldier. We can not honor him too much. In other countries they confer titles upon men for distinguished services. We have no titles here. Every man is a plain American. Thank God, we have this opportunity of recognizing the achievements of this great American by giving him the rank of general in the American Army.

I believe there ought to be but one general, no matter what anybody else may think. [Applause.] One general is all that America can afford, and I hope that the distinction which comes from the title of general in the American Army will be worn by John J. Pershing only during his lifetime. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to me to be able to bring in a rule that meets with such unanimity of sentiment. Gen. Pershing will go down in history with a record of having commanded the greatest number of men that any general, I believe it is safe to say, in the history of mankind ever commanded. There was appropriated for the support of that Army the largest sum of money that was ever appropriated in human history for the support of an army. That he filled this large place and did his work well no man now or hereafter will deny. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to note in the RECORD that it was by unanimous vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. The House, according to the terms of the resolution, resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7594, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7594, with Mr. DYER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7594, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that up to the present time I have not had any requests for time, I shall reserve the balance of my time, and shall ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] to use his time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from California [Mr KAHN] asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] is recognized.

Mr. DENT. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been pleased in listening to the gentlemen who have spoken on this rule, because I have felt in my heart from observation and knowledge of Gen. Pershing that he is entitled to every word of laudation and encomium that has been passed upon him by the Members who have preceded me.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives is unanimous in its voice and vote in bringing this resolution No. 265 before this House, making it in order to consider the bill H. R. 7594, from the Committee on Military Affairs, conferring upon Gen. Pershing the title of general.

That committee did not need the influence of the President of the United States, because every man on that committee appreciates individually and collectively the services rendered by Gen. Pershing to the United States Government. This is an honor conferred upon the American soldier, upon the individual private, upon every subordinate officer, and upon the American people by placing the title of general upon Gen. Pershing, who commanded the brave boys, more than 2,000,000 of them, who went across the seas in this great struggle.

Some gentlemen have referred to the personality of Gen. Pershing. I had the honor to meet the distinguished soldier. He invited my wife and myself and the distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. KAHN] to dine with him at his chateau in France as a compliment not so much to us but to the people whom we have the honor to represent. I found him to be a refined, elegant gentleman, educated and cultured.

Gen. Pershing as a man is typical of the American citizen. This great soldier and great American, at a time when the whole world had its eyes upon our country, was a leader of this Republic over yonder among kingdoms and empires. Gen. Pershing at the head of that great Army showed ability as a soldier, showed great executive ability as an individual, and he showed the typical heart of an American.

It is true some things might have gone wrong across the sea. No man is perfect. The only perfect man was our blessed Savior, who walked the shores of Galilee. But as an individual Gen. Pershing made fewer mistakes in organizing that great machine across the water and placing our soldiers in the proper places and having them win this great victory than any other man the Government could have sent there. [Applause.]

This Government owes to the Army a compliment, and in placing this honor upon Gen. Pershing I contend that the American Congress is placing it upon each of our soldiers, upon every man of the Army.

The truth is that the President of the United States has asked for this honor for two men. I do not believe that the American Congress should give it to more than one, and that man is Gen. Pershing. [Applause.] I believe that one admiral for the Navy is sufficient, and when the Congress of the United States gives this honor to Gen. Pershing and to one admiral of the Navy I think it will have done its full part in that method of bestowal of honors upon the American Army and the American Navy. We are not doing this so much for Pershing, the individual. We are doing it for the Army, for those 5,000,000 soldiers who wore the American uniform in the great struggle to bring victory to this Republic; and in bestowing this honor upon the general in chief across the sea, who really had the responsibility, who had the eyes of the whole world upon him, we are bestowing it upon all these soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the privilege seldom comes to a legislator to participate in conferring an honor upon his former commander in chief, and as a member of the American Expeditionary Forces I want to state that Gen. Pershing at all times enjoyed the complete confidence and admiration of every man of that expedition. [Applause.] They had confidence in him, because they knew they had a big man for the big job. So much has been said to-day of his record on the other side that it is not necessary to repeat it; but I do want to say that we have a big job in this country in the reorganization of the Army, and I personally believe that Gen. Pershing again is the big man for that big job. [Applause.] As stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], in the history of our Army we have had but one general at a time, and I hope that we will maintain that tradition and custom. In conferring the permanent rank of general to-day upon Gen. Pershing we are doing exactly what the people of this country desire. All generals of our allies have received honors from their Governments, some of them very substantial; and the least that we can do is to pass this bill to-day and let it go to the Senate, so that when Gen. Pershing returns in a few days he will be the permanent general of the great American Army. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS].

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not desire to pluck one single laurel from the brow of Missouri; but as a Nebraskan I want to lay claim to Gen. Pershing as a Nebraskan, because of the length of time that he lived in my State and because of the fact that his relatives live there now in the capital of the State, Lincoln, Nebr.

In 1893 I had the pleasure of sitting beside Gen. Pershing at commencement time in the early part of June, when he received his diploma as a graduate of the law department of the Nebraska State University. He was assigned to duty there in the training of the cadets of the university. I was serving then as private secretary to the governor of the State. I met him on frequent occasions. I have studied his history as he has gone forward from that day up to the high station which he now occupies. If time permitted, we might dwell upon some characteristics of the man, and the quiet way in which he has gone forward in discharge of his duties, not with any great demonstration or with what you might call brilliant display, but in a quiet, steady, thoughtful way, solving the problems that came to him in the Philippines, in the United States, in Mexico, and then in Europe.

Some people have said that Washington was not a great general. A son of the Iron Duke of Wellington replied to that criticism by saying that Washington was one of the greatest generals of all time, because he knew how to select and command men and put them in the proper stations to win a victory on the whole field at the right time. He was a general in command of men. Pershing has that characteristic also.

Note Gen. Grant and his quiet ways. Study the history of that quiet, steady thoughtfulness by means of which he outlined his plan of campaign and carried it through to victory. I discover in Gen. Pershing this characteristic. Without display he has analyzed the problem; he has gone forward with a clearness of vision that saw the end from the beginning. He marshaled his forces to the right and left, he brought them from the rear, he held his reserves, he commanded the situation; and as a Nebraskan I pay tribute to him to-day as a Nebraskan, and will gladly vote for the passage of this resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] to use some of his time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I should feel negligent of my duty if I did not pay a tribute to Gen. Pershing. He is all and more than was said of him by the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. I have gained personal knowledge of his consideration for the welfare of the private soldiers from visits to hospitals in this country, where I have met young men who were wounded in France, who told me that Gen. Pershing had visited the wards there in which they were sick and wounded and asked them personally how they were doing. A man of that character is a man with a heart, and, as our distinguished former Speaker [Mr. CLARK] said, we honor ourselves in honoring him.

And as a further example that came under my own personal observation, a young man, a graduate of Princeton University and former member of an all-American eleven and coach of the University of Pittsburgh football team, endeavored to enter the Army when the war broke out, but on account of a defect of vision he was unable to gain admission to the officers' training camp. He made several efforts and finally prevailed upon the draft board in his home town to send him to Camp Lee. He made further effort and got with a contingent that was going overseas. I wrote Gen. Pershing and recited the circumstances. Gen. Pershing at once ordered the young man to a training camp in France and wrote me that he took pleasure in placing him there, remarking that the young man would at least have his chance to demonstrate what was in him. That young man was commissioned a second lieutenant in the Army on the 30th of September, 1918. He went to the front and was killed in action on October 9 or 10, 1918.

Replying to numerous letters written in behalf of Pittsburgh and western Pennsylvania soldiers serving with the American Expeditionary Forces, Gen. Pershing invariably displayed a solicitude that would indicate a personal interest in the welfare and progress of all the men under his command from the humblest private up through the ranks. Not once in scores of cases concerning which I communicated with him did he fail to give marked consideration to the subject of the inquiry. This held true all through the war, and after the armistice was signed he personally ordered the return of young men with dependent or suffering families in advance of their organizations.

Gen. Pershing has demonstrated himself to be such a commander of men that this country can not pay too great an honor to him. I would like to see the people of this country and this House put aside our partisanship, our adherence to Democracy and Republicanism, and make him the unanimous choice of the conventions that assemble next year and elect him President of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I have only one more speech. Will the gentleman from Alabama use the remainder of his time?

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be such a unanimous sentiment on this side of the House in favor of the bill that I have no further requests for time, except that I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to make any extended eulogy of Gen. Pershing. So many have paid him a deserved tribute in such splendid and glowing terms that nothing I can say would add to it. His record of achievement is his greatest tribute, and his place in the hearts of the American people will always be perhaps his greatest treasure. I simply want to say that the people of my district are heartily in accord with the bestowal of this honor that is to be given him.

Aside from that, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] has asked me to-day to advise the House that he is being held in New York on account of the primaries and could not be here to take part in this session, but he wants to be recorded as strongly in favor of and heartily indorsing this resolution.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with Gen. Pershing. However, I know a little about the human side of Gen. Pershing. Making a man a general does not necessarily make him a man with great sympathies for the humanity of the world. I want to tell this little incident. There are a few men in the House that will recollect Benjamin F. Marsh, of Illinois, who had 10 or 12 years of service in this House. He was colonel of a Cavalry regiment during the Civil War and accredited himself with great honor and to the benefit of the country.

Losing his first wife he married a second one during his service in the House. There were two or three children born of that marriage. I received a letter from one of the youngest, who had the fighting spirit of his blood, and in 1914 he went to Canada and enlisted in the army. He was sent across the seas and saw over three years' service in the front as a private soldier, was wounded four times, recovered from his wound, and each time returned to the front.

About the time he was anticipating going back the last time he sat down and wrote me a letter. I did not know where the boy was or that he had gone into the English Army. In that letter he told me about his condition. He did not ask to be discharged, nay, nay. Nor did he ask for a commission. But he said "I am an American citizen fighting under a foreign flag—fighting for right, not right and country. I want to be transferred from the English Army to the American Army in France [applause] without crossing the ocean. I want to serve under the American flag in a just cause, now that America is in this great cause." He said:

> I have never regretted for an instant my going to Canada to enlist in 1914, and would under the same circumstances do it all over again. The entrance of the United States in the war justifies me in my action and gave me added determination to try to stem the German aggression. There is only one regret, that I can not serve under the colors my father fought for so long and so well. No service would be too menial, too humble, too dangerous for me if I could but end my service and perhaps my days under the Stars and Stripes. I have the greatest admiration and respect for the uniform I now wear and I have given faithful service. I hope I may come through safely; but if I die, I want to die in defense of the Stars and Stripes.

[Applause.]

I loved his father who was my colleague for years. I got busy but could not arrange it in Washington. They said there was nothing doing; that there were many requests of that kind and the doors were closed. I sat down and inclosed that letter to Gen. Pershing, telling him who Col. Marsh was, and, as I say, inclosing the letter which told its own story. I promptly received a letter in reply that he had arranged the transfer of the boy from the English Army and that he was now in the American Army. [Applause.]

O, Lord, I hope to make Gen. Pershing's acquaintance some time. He has a heart as well as great ability as a general. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the office of General of the Armies of the United States is hereby revived, and the President is hereby authorized, in his discretion and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint to said office a general officer of the Army who, on foreign soil and during the recent war, has been especially distinguished in the higher command of military forces of the United States; and the officer appointed under the foregoing authorization shall have the pay prescribed by section 24 of the act of Congress approved July 15, 1870, and such allowances as the President shall deem appropriate; and any provision of existing law that would enable any other officer of the Army to take rank and precedence over said officer is hereby repealed: Provided, That no more than one appointment to office shall be made under the terms of this act.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, under ordinary circumstances I would not have spoken upon this occasion except for the fact that I feel that to a great extent Texas contributed Pershing to the annals of the world. His service was largely upon the frontier. We remember with pride his efforts in the famous Villa expedition, the result of which, unsatisfactory though it was, was not due to any fault of this splendid general. He was living in El Paso, Tex., when the sad news came of the great loss of his family by fire in California. He was living in San Antonio when he was summoned to Washington, and from Washington was sent to France. I remember very well, as one of a committee that called upon him upon that occasion, the soldierly diffidence with which he declined to answer the questions propounded by the committee as to whether the summons was a summons to command in France. At that time war was declared. It was well known that we were going across the water, and when he left our city with its many memories, ancient and historic, we knew that the banner of the American Army on the far-flung fields of France would be placed in the hands of John J. Pershing, and those of us who had seen him in his goings in and comings out in our city as commander in chief of the Southern Department knew full well that that banner would be carried not only to a glorious victory under the leadership of John J. Pershing but to a stainless and glorious victory. [Applause.]

One singular thought has occurred to me in connection with the history of this remarkable man, as applied to the history of our country. George Washington, wonderful and glorious man that he was, did not escape censure. There were calls for the removal of Washington from the command of the American Army. In the War with Mexico and in the War of 1812 there were differences in respect to the commanding officers, and in the great war between the States the commanding officers were constantly changed. There were criticisms in the Spanish-American War, but if there ever was a man who commanded an army, an army of over 4,000,000 men, in the greatest war known to the world, of whom there has been not only no visible criticism but absolute unanimous commendation through the entire course of the war, it has been of John J. Pershing. [Applause.] He combines the great qualities of the soldier with the splendid humane qualities of a man, because he is in truth and in fact what the regulations of the Army contemplate that he shall be—an officer and a gentleman. That is the reason why the great American Congress to-day, regardless of party, is glad to pay tribute to him, to accord to him this distinguished honor, because, as was said by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], we are not only honoring him but we are honoring our country. He has brought honor to us. And in behalf of Texas, the field of his activities, under whose mellow moon he studied the problems of war, along whose far-flung border he pursued his training as a soldier and equipped himself for his splendid service, and because we knew him as a soldier and loved him as a man, and found in him a splendid type of American, we pay on this day this deserved tribute to John J. Pershing. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DYER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. As I recollect the rule, it provides that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. It does. The question therefore is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think that this is a bill that ought to be passed by a quorum, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman before he makes that point allow me to make this suggestion to him, that he ask for a rising vote?

Mr. BLANTON. I think we ought to have a quorum here to vote on an important bill as this—to do honor to a general of the United States Army.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the parliamentary situation?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not put a parliamentary inquiry after the point of no quorum is made. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-one Members are present, not a quorum. This is an automatic call of the House. The question is on the passage of the bill. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 274, nays 4, answered "present" 1, not voting 151, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SNELL). A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a motion to adjourn in honor of our brave private soldiers, sailors, and marines and as a further mark of esteem to them, it apparently being impossible to do anything else for them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to adjourn.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that motion may be read by the Clerk. My motion is in writing, and under the rules of the House I ask that my written motion to adjourn in honor of privates be read from the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the parliamentary inquiry. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), the House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 223.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleague, Representative JOHNSON of Washington, be excused for the day on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleague, Mr. CROWTHER, I ask that he be excused from attendance on this House for five days on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. The proper way is to put those requests in writing. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. CROWTHER, may be granted a leave of absence for five days on account of important business. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WELCOME TO GEN. PERSHING.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, from the Committee on Rules, submits the following report:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House concurrent resolution No. 29, submit a privileged report on said resolution, with the recommendation that the following resolution be agreed to:

House concurrent resolution 29.

Resolved, etc., That a joint committee, to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, respectively, shall be named for the purpose of making arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War. That said committee shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives such program and procedure therefor as in its opinion shall be fitting and appropriate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it has been thought fitting that on the return of Gen. Pershing he have such public reception as is fitting to the return of a great soldier from a foreign field to his own country, and it is with the view of providing such a reception that this committee has authorized this resolution. If there is no request for time on the other side, I move the previous question.

Mr. POU. There is no desire for time on this side.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question for information.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this contemplate the parade we are going to have?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This is a separate function?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. This is a separate function which is contemplated by the resolution. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to which was referred House resolution 264, submit a privileged report on said resolution, with a recommendation that the resolution be agreed to, as follows:

House resolution 264.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 2622, being a bill to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920.

There shall be two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by those favoring the bill and one-half to be controlled by those opposing the bill.

Whereupon the bill shall be read for amendments. At the conclusion of such consideration the committee shall report the bill with such amendments as may have been agreed to. The previous questions shall be considered as ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask the distinguished and courteous chairman of the Committee on Rules whether or not among any of these various resolutions that are brought in under rule there has been any attempt by his committee to bring in a rule that will make in order proper legislation to do anything in behalf of or confer any honor upon the brave and deserving private soldiers, sailors, and marines who valiently fought in behalf of their country?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution makes in order a bill asked for by the War Department, stating that it was necessary to retain certain officers of the Army in the service who came in from civil life, at least, until June 30, 1920. It is asserted the officers are especially needed in the Medical Corps to take care of the sick and wounded soldiers not yet discharged. There are other officers, it is said, needed to take care of something like $6,000,000,000 worth of property that is scattered throughout the country, some of it in our own country and some of it in Europe. This property should be taken care of. Also the Air Service, a service that has really been added to our military forces during this war—only a small percentage of officers now engaged in the Air Service have come in from the Regular Army.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. As I understand the resolution, it makes in order a bill that will provide for 18,000 officers?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is, a total of that many. It adds, I think, something like 6,000.

Mr. GARNER. It makes a total of 18,000?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I saw a statement in the paper the other day, purporting to be an authentic statement from the War Department, which said that on the 1st day of October there would be 225,000 troops in the Army. If you make this arrangement, you will have 1 officer for each 12 men. Is it necessary to have that many officers?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am submitting this resolution at the request of the Committee on Military Affairs, and they say that the War Department asked for 24,000.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is making it possible for Congress to consider the question of selecting 18,000 officers to command 225,000 troops. I am asking him whether he thinks it necessary to have 1 officer for each 12 men?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am informed that this bill did not come as a unanimous report from the Committee on Military Affairs. Some members of the Committee on Military Affairs thought a limit of 15,000 officers, all told, was sufficient. They thought that would be quite sufficient.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman does not favor 18,000 officers to command 225,000 men?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No. I favor merely considering the matter upon the floor at this time, because it is necessary to retain some medical officers and aviation officers.

Mr. GARNER. We have an authorization of 12,000 officers now, and we shall have 225,000 men on the 1st day of October. Are not 12,000 officers sufficient to command 225,000 men?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that will be discussed, I assume, by the members of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I will say that the Secretary of War said it would require 24,000 officers, but he thought he could get along, possibly, with 18,000.

Mr. KAHN. That is not quite the statement, if the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War sent to all the bureaus of the War Department directing them to cut down to the lowest figure commensurate with safety the number of officers that were needed to demobilize and bring the Army back to a peace condition. The bureaus reported that they would have to have 24,000 officers to do the work. There is a great deal more work to do than the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] imagines. The War Department of its own motion cut the estimate of 24,000 officers down to 18,000, and they believe that they ought to have that many.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and has some knowledge, probably, of military affairs. [Laughter.] I will ask him the question whether he considers one officer to 12 men necessary in the American Army?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the gentleman will readily understand that that proportion does not exist in every branch of the service. In some branches, of course, there are a great many more enlisted men to one officer. In other branches of the service there are very few enlisted men.

Mr. GARNER. That does not answer my question. If we are to have 225,000 privates, is it necessary to have 18,000 officers to command that number of men?

Mr. KAHN. I think that in order to get back to a peace basis, to take care of the property of the United States, $6,500,000,000 worth, according to the latest estimate, to take care of the Air Service, to take care of the Tank Service, to take care of the Motor Transport Service, all new services that are not provided for in the existing national defense law, it is necessary to have these 18,000 officers.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if Secretary Baker stated to him that 24,000 officers were necessary to command for the coming year?

Mr. KAHN. No. The Secretary of War, in a communication to me, which I in good time will ask to be read to the House, stated, as I told the House, that he had asked for estimates from his bureau chiefs and that they had recommended 24,000 officers, whereupon he used his discretion and cut the number to 18,000.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the Secretary of War has asked the Committee on Military Affairs to prepare a bill providing for 18,000 officers to command during the coming year?

Mr. KAHN. They are not all commanders. The gentleman must understand they are not all commanding officers. They are officers performing certain functions, but they are not in charge of troops.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then the Secretary of War, in a communication to the gentleman, has asked that a bill be prepared for 18,000 officers?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Then upon that request coming from the Secretary of War, is the gentleman ready now to defend the position taken by the Secretary of War, or does he think it his province to put up to the House the demands and recommendations of the Secretary of War?

Mr. KAHN. I believe——

Mr. DUNBAR. And are you, as chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, on the defense, or is the Secretary of War on the defense?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think there is any great defense about it. I propose to give the House in my time a statement of the facts, and I hope to be able to convince the House that this number of officers is needed; and I shall abide, as, of course, I shall have to abide, by the decision of the House.

Mr. DUNBAR. Another question, please. Then it is your object——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I shall not yield further for a violation of the parliamentary language that must be observed by gentlemen on the floor of this House while I have anything to do with it. The rule provides that gentlemen must not address each other in the second person.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement of the rule is correct.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield for a question.

Mr. LITTLE. How many officers were estimated to be necessary at the time when it was proposed that the Army should consist of 500,000 men?

Mr. KAHN. Twenty-eight thousand officers at the time that it was asked that the Army be made 500,000 men.

Mr. LITTLE. Then one other question: If these officers are not going to command, why should they be officers instead of privates?

Mr. KEARNS. Some of them are medical.

Mr. LITTLE. Why should they not be privates?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield further. I want to know whether we can agree on time for the consideration of this rule? The rule provides for two hours of general debate on the bill.

Mr. GARRETT. The rule provides for two hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to it. Now, if we can have an agreement as to the persons who are to control the time, it may simplify matters. I understand there is only one member of the committee on this side opposed to the bill. That is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. I have sent for him, and he is not present. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] wants 15 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. On the bill?

Mr. GARRETT. It is not related wholly to the bill. This debate is not confined to the bill. If we can have the assurance that my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] can have 15 minutes on the bill, we will not ask for any time on the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There will be two hours' general debate, one hour to be controlled by this side and one hour, I assume, by that side.

Mr. LITTLE. The rule says one-half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is what the rule provides.

Mr. LITTLE. Who will have charge of the time?

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. While it is not customary to discuss on the floor what happened in the committee, it is an open secret that on the final vote to report this bill the only objection raised against the bill was raised by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Kansas how he is going to divide the time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, is opposed to the bill, and will therefore have one hour of time. The other hour will be under the control of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] privately, saying that I wished to obtain 15 minutes for my colleague, Judge DAVIS, to talk on a matter not directly relating to the bill. All that I am seeking is the assurance that he can get that time during general debate on the bill. Otherwise I would like to get it for him on the rule, and he prefers to wait about 5 or 10 minutes, if possible.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By what authority are these gentlemen doing all this talking?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has the floor and has yielded.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But he does not have indefinite time.

The SPEAKER. No; but he has one hour.

Mr. GARRETT. In order to get the matter straightened out, although the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is not, so far as I know, opposed to the bill, he is the second Democratic member of the committee, and I ask that the rule be modified so as to provide that one-half the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and one-half the time by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. KAHN. I suggest that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] control the time on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] control one half of the time and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the resolution be modified so that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] control one hour and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] the other. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] will take the chair.

Mr. SNELL took the chair amid applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 2622, to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to officers of the permanent establishment as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment, and to retain at their temporary grade such officers of the Regular Army as he may deem necessary: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected so far as practicable from officers who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointment in the permanent establishment: Provided further, That after September 30, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers held in active service under this act shall at no time exceed 18,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to officers of the permanent establishment as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected, so far as practicable, from officers and enlisted men who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointments in the permanent establishment: Provided further, That after October 30, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers in active service shall at no time exceed 18,000: Provided further, That no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at schools and colleges, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty: And provided further, That 1,200 officers shall be assigned to the Air Service, of whom not less than 85 per cent shall be duly qualified fliers."

The CHAIRMAN. By agreement the two hours of general debate under the rule will be controlled one half by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS] and the other half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to trespass to any great extend on the time and patience of this committee, but I would like to impress upon the membership of the committee the great importance of this bill. I was sorry indeed a while ago to note that there is to be some opposition to it, but I am hopeful that before the time allotted for debate has expired each Member of this House might be impressed with the great importance and necessity of this measure.

This Congress two months ago in an appropriation bill said to the War Department, "We want the Army demobilized at the very earliest practicable moment"; and therefore that appropriation was so limited that it was necessary to discharge the National Army down to a prewar strength by the 30th of September of this year. By doing this we have left the Secretary of War, so he claims, without sufficient legislation to maintain a commissioned personnel to take care of the necessary business that always follows in the wake of any war. I know that it has been contended that there is existing law under which the Secretary, as long as the emergency lasts, can keep up the commissioned personnel of the Army to such strength as he deems necessary to take care of the business. But in a later communication to the House the Secretary says that he finds himself without this authority. I am frank to say to this House that I care not whether the Secretary of War has that authority or not. He has indicated to us that he believes he has not, and that he will not exercise such debatable authority. You and I by our vote declared war against the Imperial Government of Germany, and by reason of this fact we find in the various hospitals scattered over the United States 29,000 sick and wounded men in bed. Under the demobilization order there will only be about 700 officers in the Medical Department on the 30th day of September of this year.

These men are sick and wounded because you and I issued the mandate that sent them into the zone of danger. The War Department says to us that it will require not only the 700 medical officers that they will have on the 30th of September, but it will require something like 1,700 or 1,800 officers in addition to take care of these sick and wounded men.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Of course the gentleman means that we will require that many officers in addition to those authorized by law?

Mr. KEARNS. I thought I said that.

Mr. KAHN. I did not so understand the gentleman. He said that it would require that number of officers.

Mr. KEARNS. I meant to say that many in addition. I do not want to see one dissenting vote on the Republican side of this House on this bill. The increase in the personnel of officers as asked for in this bill will cost this Government perhaps $18,000,000 additional. But since these boys require the attention of these medical men, I do not believe that the Republican Congress should be so miserly and niggardly that, in order to save $18,000,000, or any part thereof, it would allow one of these boys to die unattended in a hospital.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. Did I understand the gentleman to say that we had 30,000 wounded men in the hospitals?

Mr. KEARNS. I said 29,000.

Mr. BEGG. I will be generous and make it 30,000. The gentleman says we have 700 officers in the Medical Corps now, or we would have on the 30th of September.

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. And that we require 1,700 more. That would make a total of 2,400.

Mr. KEARNS. If the gentleman will wait until I get through—I say we have 29,000 sick and wounded in the hospital. We have 10,000 or 12,000 men in the convalescent camps who need the attention every day of medical men. We have besides that an Army of 250,000 men, some of whom will be sick and some of whom will need the constant attention of a physician. That would make a population of 300,000, with a sick population of 35,000 constantly in need of medical attendance throughout the nine months, the period covered by this bill. For remember this measure, if it becomes a law, will be only temporary. It will become void after June 30, 1920. So it seems to me that the War Department has not been extravagant when it asks Congress to pass legislation which will allow the War Department to have sufficient medical men to take care of the sick and wounded and those in the Regular Establishment that may become sick or wounded.

Mr. BEGG. Now, will the gentleman allow me to finish my question?

Mr. KEARNS. No; I have only 10 minutes and I have given the gentleman the benefit of my opinion, and if the gentleman has made up his mind to cast his vote not to give them this medical attention anything that I could say further would not convince him.

Now, from a business standpoint the only reason why any Member can vote not to allow the increase asked by the War Department would be on account of the cost, and I hope there will not be one such vote on the Republican side, and I hope there will not be a man in the House that will vote against the bill simply because it will cost $18,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. KEARNS. No; I will not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the question only for information.

Mr. KEARNS. Well, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The fighting ceased November 11, 1918, nine months ago?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not nature so helped to cure men who have not died from their wounds up to this time that it is not necessary to retain 1,700 more doctors in the service?

Mr. KEARNS. I have just told the gentleman that there are lying in sick beds 29,000, who are either sick or wounded; that there are in the convalescent camps ten or twelve thousand more; that we have an Army population in the Regular Establishment of 225,000 men, all whom at times will need medical attention.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky rose.

Mr. KEARNS. I can not yield any further, as I have only 10 minutes. There is another reason. We have property belonging to the Government amounting to something like $6,000,000,000. About $4,000,000,000 of that will have to be salvaged and put on the market and sold. This property needs attention. It needs to be guarded and taken care of in order that it may not deteriorate in value. We need officers to command the men who are guarding it. We need officers to see that it is kept intact till sold, and when sold to see that it is delivered to the buyer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill S. 2236, an act relating to affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war."

PROVIDING NECESSARY COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY UNTIL JUNE 30, 1920.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if I vote against this bill it will not be on account of the finances, but unless some one interested in the bill enlightens me upon the proposition of the Army officers using too many privates to take care of them and using too many of the boys in the Army under that pretext, I am disposed to vote against the bill. I want to talk for just a minute about one institution that has been called to my attention recently. It is the hospital at Cooperstown, N. Y. I am informed that there is no one in that hospital who is sick or ailing, that the officers are using it as a summer resort where they are enjoying life, that they are keeping privates there to care for them, boys who ought to be discharged from the Army, who enlisted only for the duration of the war; that these officers are abusing that privilege.

I am informed that there are civilians in that hospital now and that the officers are requiring privates from my own State to wait upon and serve them—boys that have no more business being in that hospital there as waiters and servants than have you or I, boys who went to the Army as volunteers from a patriotic standpoint to fight for their Government, but who are now up there acting as servants to help officers entertain their civilian friends. I am informed that they are using that hospital in that way. When I asked the Secretary of War to look into the matter and to secure the release of these privates I received no answer; no attention is paid to me. I was advised that the commanding officer there would pay little attention to me because he wants to hold the job; that there is nothing in civil life for him and he has no ambition to get back to it, and does not understand the nature of men who do want to get back to civil life. I wrote to him and he turned me down with the proposition that they could not release these privates until they could be replaced. Replaced as what? As servants—these men of affairs, substantial business men, who left their business and enlisted for the duration of the war. They have been held there for two or three months over their own protests, and if that is what you want with more officers, to require more business men as servants to wait upon them, I am against this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise primarily to reply to some remarks made earlier in the day by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], which are in line with similar statements made from time to time by Members of the majority party. After engaging in a general criticism with respect to the demobilization of the military forces, the gentleman from Indiana engaged in a very spirited criticism of the fact that several thousand—I believe he said 6,500—men were to be sent overseas very shortly, and he drew some conclusions as to what would follow if the Senate adopted the treaty of peace, including the league of nations covenant. Let us consider the facts as they actually exist.

After the Civil War it took 18 months for the demobilization of the military forces of this Government. After the Spanish-American War, under a Republican administration, it took 10 months for the demobilization of 197,397 men, and for a year or two afterwards a considerable force of the Regular Army, under Gen. Wood, was kept in the island of Cuba for the purpose of restoring peace and stabilizing conditions, without criticism on the part of anyone. Now, after the conclusion of this World War, when times are as unsettled as they are, a Democratic administration in less than 10 months has demobilized nearly 4,000,000 men, half of whom have had to be brought from across the seas. Only a comparatively small number still remain overseas, and in order that they may be relieved this Government called for 50,000 volunteers, it being expressly announced that they were to volunteer for foreign service, to relieve the men who had borne the brunt of battle, in order that they might return home. The posters calling for such volunteers, which were posted all over this country, invited the men to volunteer in order that they might see foreign service. They volunteered with their eyes open, and the most of them for the very purpose of seeing foreign service.

These men referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, the 6,500 men who are being sent across to replace the boys who were in the war, are some of those volunteers, members of the Regular Army. Yet the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] engages in bitter criticism of the administration for sending those men to relieve men who were in the war. Why are they being sent? Because we have valuable property interests over there—railroads and other property and equipment—which have not yet been disposed of, but which are being disposed of as rapidly as possible, as well as many other important interests requiring the protection of a small military force. I think it is marvelous that we have come as near as we have to withdrawing all of our military forces from Europe, after the greatest war in the world's annals, when it took a Republican administration over two years to withdraw all of their forces from Cuba, although they never at any time had over 20,000 men there.

During the short time that I have been a Member of this House I have been making some observations, and although I have several times discussed pending legislation on the floor of this House, yet this is the first time I have even replied to any political arguments. However, patience sometimes ceases to be a virtue, and I take this opportunity to raise my voice, feeble though it be, in refutation of some of the slanderous and unjust statements emanating from gentlemen on the Republican side.

I have observed that while some chairmen of your committees, notably the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which has reported out this bill, have manifested a commendable and a refreshing spirit of patriotism and nonpartisanship and a desire to legislate in the interest and the welfare of the masses of the people, yet, on the other hand, I have been impressed with the fact that many Members on the Republican side seem to have no higher motive than to engage in continual petty faultfinding. Some of you have spoken time after time and have never yet made any speech or any statement that was not partisan in nature, and you have manifested no purpose or desire to help solve the great questions with which we are now confronted. Many of you have repeatedly indulged in petty partisan criticism of the extravagances of this war, and yet the statistics show that, although we were engaged in this war for considerably over a year, and although we had to mobilize, equip, and train 4,000,000 men and send 2,000,000 men 3,000 miles overseas, and have brought most of them back, yet the cost per man of this great war was less than twice as much per man as the money spent per man by the Republican administration in the Spanish-American War, although the actual fighting in the latter-named war lasted but three months, and that war was but a skirmish compared to the World War.

Instead of solving the reconstruction and high cost of living problems, which are pressing for solution, most of you on the Republican side are devoting all of your time to petty faultfinding and to authorizing and conducting expensive investigations in order to determine how and why we won the war, with a hope that in the enormous expenditures, made amidst the speedy preparation, you may, someway, somehow, unearth something that will aid you in the next campaign. You have been driven almost to distraction by knowledge of the fact that America's stupendous and marvelous achievements were accomplished by a Democratic administration and that a Democratic President is the foremost citizen and most commanding figure in all the world. Many of you are afflicted with an incurable malady, which may be correctly defined as anti-Wilsonphobia. Utterly ignoring the great achievements of his administration, both in peace and during war, and utterly unwilling to accord him any credit therefor, you engage in a continuous campaign of misrepresentation, trivial criticism, and unwarranted abuse, taking as your pretext the alleged misconduct of some subordinate official, a letter from some irresponsible party, or some unverified newspaper report. In one breath you charge the President with usurpation of power, and in the next breath you criticize him because he does not exercise more power. In view of the fact that all of this is clearly for political effect, you are evidently very much perturbed in mind and very apprehensive as to your political status. You evidently feel very insecure, or else you would be content to let matters rest. You clamored for the President to call you into extra session in order that you might pass much-needed constructive legislation and reduce the high cost of living, and yet, although you have been in session for over three months, you have enacted no constructive legislation, unless a few high-protective tariff bills constitute your idea of postwar constructive legislation; and aside from passing one bill at the urgent request of the President, embodying one of his suggestions, you have enacted no legislation looking to the reduction of the high cost of living, except to repeal the tax on ice cream and soda water.

Furthermore, in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana, that sending these 6,500 men overseas was simply a forerunner of what would be sent if we were to adopt the treaty of peace, including the league of nations, I wish to state that the very purpose of the league of nations is to so arrange the affairs of the world that it will not be necessary to send any soldiers overseas, and the greatest minds and hearts of your own party recognize that it will probably have that effect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REAVIS rose.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If some of you would read the patriotic articles that are being daily published from the pen of your great Republican ex-President, Mr. Taft, you would acquire a different vision from that which you now possess.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. I understood the gentleman to say that the purpose of the league of nations was to prevent sending soldiers overseas?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the gentleman know that one of the provisions of the document known as the league of nations will keep our soldiers on the Rhine for 15 years in exact terms? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; in comparatively small numbers, but without the league of nations you and other Members of this House were compelled to vote to send 2,000,000 boys overseas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And this league of nations will fix it so that we will only have to send a small number for 15 years, and after that not be compelled to send any. That is not merely my view, but it is the view of the greatest men of your own party.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. As I understand, that provision for keeping our soldiers there is not part of the league of nations covenant but a part of the treaty of peace. It is not in the league of nations at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. Is the gentleman in favor of the retention of American soldiers in Siberia at this time?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Not any longer than absolutely necessary in order to keep our solemn agreement which was made with the allied nations to keep them there temporarily.

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. My time is so limited; there are some other things I wish to say. But if my time is extended I will answer the gentleman's and all other questions.

As high an authority as the able and respected Republican ex-Attorney General, James W. Wickersham, gave out a written statement the other day in which he said that the objections now being urged against the league of nations are almost identical with those that were urged at the time against the adoption by the Colonies of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Wickersham further stated:

The failure to accept the peace covenant would destroy the most practical plan for the preservation of the world's peace ever submitted to the acceptance of the nations. Let the Senate ratify the treaty and thus avert from America the reproach of depriving the world of the great hope, the radiant promise, of a world allied for the preservation of peace.

[Applause.]

Now, many of you on that side would substitute for a governed world a chaotic world, if by so doing you could in some manner embarrass a Democratic administration or discount the achievements of a Democratic President.

Mr. TINCHER rose.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am convinced that many of you are more concerned in an effort to destroy and disparage the accomplishments of this great administration and thereby gain political advantage than you are in settling these great problems or in future world peace.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. Does the gentleman consider that the Baker military bill as introduced in the Senate, as suggested by Secretary Baker, providing for compulsory training, is necessary to carry out the league of nations and is to go with the league of nations? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The league of nations covenant has not been adopted, and my opinion is that if it is adopted and as soon as world conditions have become settled we will not need any Army except sufficient to maintain order here at home. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. My time is very limited.

Mr. KAHN. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. Does not the gentleman remember that the President himself stated when he came back from France the first time that he did not believe that the league of nations provision would stop war entirely, but he did think it would reduce the possibility of war to a minimum?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes. I do not think it would stop war entirely any more than the law against murder will stop murder entirely, but I do not think for that reason we are any more justified in not making an earnest effort to stop war than we are in making an earnest effort to stop murder. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, gentlemen, I want to quote from another great Republican authority and a great American, and I want to show you that instead of following the greatest men in your own party you are following some petty politicians in your party who are merely seeking political advantage. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Here are some words to which I want you to give close attention while I read them to you. Listen to this quotation:

All the civilized powers which are able and willing to furnish and to use force, when force is required to back up righteousness * * * should join together to create an international tribunal and to provide rules, in accordance with which that tribunal should act. These rules would have to accept the status quo at some given period, for the endeavor to redress all historical wrongs would throw us back into chaos. They would lay down the rule that the territorial integrity of each nation was inviolate; that it was to be guaranteed absolutely its sovereign rights in matters affecting its honor and vital interest * * *. All other matters that could arise between these nations should be settled by the international court * * *. Then, and most important, the nations should severally guarantee to use their entire military force, if necessary, against any nation which defied the decrees of the tribunal or which violated any of the rights which in the rules it was expressly stipulated should be reserved to the several nations, and rights to their territorial integrity and the like.

In addition to the contracting powers, a certain number of outside nations should be named as entitled to the benefits of the court. These nations should be chosen from those which are as civilized and well-behaved as the great contracting nations, but which, for some reason or other, were unwilling or unable to guarantee to help execute the decrees of the court by force.

No power should be admitted into the first circle, that of the contracting powers, unless it was civilized, well behaved, and able to do its part in enforcing the decrees of the court.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. You will notice that this article directly recognizes and advocates the very principles involved in article 10 of the league of nations covenant, which is now being so violently attacked by some of you and others, and this quotation is from none other than an article printed in 1915 in the Outlook from the pen of Theodore Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield? Does not the gentleman know that certain proponents of the league of nations have openly rejoiced that the voice of Theodore Roosevelt has been silenced?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; I do not know any such thing, and I resent such an imputation. But that imputation is an evidence of the narrow partisanship to which I have been referring. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I have only a minute or two, unless you can get me more time.

Mr. RHODES. The gentleman stated a few moments ago that he was not in favor of the retention of American soldiers in Siberia any longer than necessary. In your opinion about how long will it be before the American soldiers can be withdrawn from Siberia?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman knows that that matter depends entirely upon circumstances, and you should not expect me to be a prophet and look into the future, when for three months you gentlemen have not been able to answer the people in their requests, coming from all over the Nation, and present some real solutions of the problems with which you are confronted.

The gentleman from Indiana also engaged in a severe criticism of the Shantung provision in the treaty of peace, and Members on that side have repeatedly spoken in criticism of that provision. In the few minutes left to me I can not enter into any real discussion of this question. However, I wish to call attention to the fact that President Wilson and the other American peace delegates had to deal with the conflicting interests and ideals of twenty-odd allied nations, and it is preposterous to expect them to have been able to induce all of those nations to agree to a peace treaty in full conformity with their own views, much less one that would please every Republican politician. It is marvelous that all of the different allied nations could reach a common agreement at all, and especially that there was evolved a treaty of peace and a league of nations covenant, about which so little can be said in criticism, even by the hypercritical Republicans who are so desperately seeking for political capital.

What are the facts about the Shantung matter? At the time of the Boxer troubles, by way of indemnity China granted certain concessions in the form of a lease, with political and exclusive dominion for 100 years over the town of Kiaochow, together with an economic right to construct a railway through the Province of Shantung, which Germany and China should jointly operate and which Germany might police. Germany acquired no other governmental control, except the indirect influence of operating and policing that railway through Shantung; it was not a cession of political dominion.

When Japan was induced to unite with Great Britain and France and Russia against Germany, one of the inducements offered her, it seems, was a transfer of German rights in China. She thereupon proceeded to conquer Kiaochow, a work of considerable difficulty, and establish herself in possession of the German holdings. She then policed the Pacific for the Allies and drove Germany out of that very large part of the globe. She also helped to guard transports from Australia and other countries of the allied nations into the Mediterranean.

When the question arose as to the disposition to be made of German colonies and holdings outside of Germany, Japan claimed these rights in Shantung as a part of the contract under which she entered the war. The contract, of course, did not bind the United States, but it did bind the other allies.

President Wilson and the American delegates insisted that Shantung should be immediately and absolutely restored to China. Japan steadfastly refused to agree to this, insisting that her agreement made with Great Britain and France and Russia should be kept. The representatives of Great Britain and France declined to break their agreement with Japan. After prolonged negotiations President Wilson finally succeeded in inducing Japan to agree to later restore Shantung to China; this is embodied in the treaty of peace. Japan informed the allied representatives that she would decline to enter the league of nations unless the Allies agreed for her to retain for the present the rights in China which she had wrested from Germany. President Wilson finally reluctantly yielded, after, as before stated, exacting a promise from Japan to later restore all of her rights in Shantung to China.

In a recently published article ex-President Taft stated that a failure to yield to Japan meant a new war. In the article referred to ex-President Taft further stated:

The other results of the Boxer rebellion, with the territorial acquisition of the other Governments, are not to be changed. In other words, the reform under the league of nations and the principles declared in the 14 points can not practically be made retroactive in every case.

Of course we deprecate Japan's insistence on retaining German rights, but we would be unreasonable if we did not realize how exceedingly difficult it was for the President to change a situation created before he was a factor in it. It is said that he yielded on the Shantung business in order to save the league of nations. Be it so. That was the statesmanlike course to pursue. Suppose, instead, that insistence upon a restoration of Kiaochow and the economic rights to China had led Japan to refuse to subscribe to the league of nations and to stand out against such a peace settlement. Her then position in the world would have been a constant threat. Germany would promptly take advantage of her attitude and an alliance between the two would be quite certain. The necessary result of such an alliance would be the beginning of a new alignment, ultimately to result in another war.

How much prejudiced is China by this result of the war? Japan is not likely to have any more spirit of encroachment than Germany would have had. Senator BORAH and Senator JOHNSON were certainly not in favor of our going to war with Germany to take the Shantung rights away from her. Are they in favor of doing so now with Japan?

The worst thing that could happen to China would be the failure of the league of nations; Japan could then work her exploiting purpose with China with little or no restraint from us. The league of nations offers to China a full opportunity to bring Japan before the tribunals of the league and before the considered public opinion of the world over any schemes of Japan to secure further dominion over the Chinese Republic.

I am answering your small partisan arguments, prompted by a lack of patriotism and accurate information, in the words of your own leaders, who, in fact, represent the views of the masses of the people, who are not to be denied the opportunity for future world peace by technical quibbles over comparatively immaterial features of the peace treaty.

That able Republican Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], in a recent speech, declared that the effort to adopt the Shantung amendment was to drive a "poisoned dagger" into the peace treaty, and to defeat the treaty and the league, and that it would "renew this World War and send our soldiers into the Orient single-handed and alone to drive Japan out of China," or else the proposed amendment awarding Shantung to China would be ineffective.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] seriously objects to 6,500 members of our Regular Army going to Europe to relieve some of our boys over there, and yet he would involve us in a war with Japan, a powerful military nation, which would involve the sacrifice of untold numbers of our boys.

Why and when have some of you Republicans and some at the other end of the Capitol become so deeply concerned over the welfare of China, the most populous nation on the globe, which has always refused to defend itself? Why were you so content for Germany to have those rights in Shantung, when you are so unwilling for them to be temporarily retained by an ally who helped us to win the war against Prussianism?

Many of you have repeatedly denounced the Shantung provision in the peace treaty as an outrage, and yet Japan gobbled up all of Korea under a Republican administration, and not one of you raised your voice in protest. Roosevelt, who was then the Republican President, not only made no protest, but he flatly refused to receive the letter and appeal of the Emperor of Korea sent by a personal representative.

Germany acquired her rights in Shantung in March, 1898, during President McKinley's administration, and neither President McKinley nor you nor any other Republican protested against it. Neither did any of you protest when Japan acquired those rights of Germany by act of war, nor did any of you protest until the treaty of peace was presented for ratification by a Democratic President. In a blind effort to obtain political advantage, you are willing to throw away the victory won by the sacrifices and valorous deeds of our soldiers and sailors and make possible the awful horrors and cruelties of another World War.

Instead of any of you having made a previous protest, on the other hand, on September 6, 1899, 18 months after Germany had made the treaty with China acquiring the said rights in Shantung, John Hay, then Republican Secretary of State, addressed a letter to Count Von Buelow, in which he expressly recognized that treaty, and commended the liberal policy being pursued by Germany in Shantung. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that any gentleman on the floor of the House is under the impression that I favor retaining officers in the Army that are not necessary or an Army of too great size. I think the best thing I ever did in my short legislative life was in opposition to the appropriation bill in which we cut down the Army from 507,000 to an average of 300,000. Events have proven we were right in that, but had we at that time followed the recommendation of the General Staff we would have had an excessive Army on our hands and would have spent something like $170,000,000 more.

But the facts here are somewhat different. Some of the gentlemen are asking for information, and I would ask the gentlemen to have the kindness and patience to read the report. That contains a list showing exactly how these officers are to be used.

You must bear in mind the fact that we had an Army of 4,000,000 men. This Army is being demobilized. The men are being discharged. But that is not all there is to it. There are the records of these men to be kept, the property of the Army to be cared for, the ordnance of the Army. All this vast amount of supplies must be cared for.

Now, then, according to the provisions of the national defense act, the War Department is authorized to maintain something like 11,750 officers. Out of that number of officers there is no provision for the Air Service, for the Chemical Warfare Service, or for the Tank Corps.

Mr. KAHN. And for the Motor Transport Corps and the Construction Corps.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and for the Motor Transport Corps and the Construction Corps. I thank the gentleman from California. Now, I find that out of the 11,750 officers they have taken 950 and assigned them to these various corps. The Quartermaster Corps has an enormous amount of work to do, and all the additional officers that we are allowing by this bill to the Quartermaster Corps will make a total in that service of 1,072. The Air Service will get 1,200 men, and that number is limited by the bill. Then we have the Medical Corps, where provision is made for 2,877. I doubt whether it will be possible to obtain the services of 2,877 doctors to remain in the Medical Corps. But we need those men. We have hospitals, as you know, scattered all over the country. And the number of officers provided include also all officers who are sick, injured, and disabled until such time as they are discharged or pensioned.

Now, if any gentleman has any information of any hospital that is being used as a summer resort, I want to get it. I will go to the bat on it. I will go to the bat on anything of that kind that you can give me. I am looking for it. But if you have not the facts, it is not right to assert anything like that in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman was in the Chamber, was he not, when I mentioned the name of the hospital—Cooperstown, N. Y.?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will go to Cooperstown; you bet I will.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. As to the matter of hospitals and abuses in the hospitals, there is a committee that is now investigating that subject, and I suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] that he confer with the chairman of the subcommittee that has the hospitals in charge, in order that the information he is possessed of may be thoroughly investigated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Under the apportionment the Air Service was allowed, I think, 255 officers. The present Chief of Staff, as you all know, is not in sympathy with the Air Service for some reason of his own; I do not know why. He is prejudiced against the Air Service, so that he has filled that quota of 235 men with men from other branches of the service, not flying officers; so that out of the 235 men we have, beginning with the chief of the Air Service, men who are not trained for that kind of work, men who are not in sympathy with the development of the Air Service, men who do not understand the Air Service, so that if we were not to pass this bill we would have on the 1st of October 235 men, of whom only a small percentage would be fliers, while a still smaller percentage would be men who are technically trained and qualified to care for the vast property that we have.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman knows, of course, that every time application is made for the addition of an officer to the Army it makes it necessary to provide four or five privates to wait on him?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I never had privates waiting on me.

Mr. LITTLE. Was the gentleman in the Regular Army?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. You were not in the Regular Army?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I was in the temporary Army.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. You know the officers usually oppose the demobilization of privates. You have had experience in that. Do they not usually oppose any discharge?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say to the gentleman that of these officers that we are providing most of them will be detailed for other work. In the Quartermaster Corps, for instance, we are employing civilians.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Why can not privates do that work as well as officers, with a good deal less pay?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In one breath the gentleman says he wants to get the men out, and in another he says "Let the privates stay in." We are providing for the Army, and it must be officered by military men. That is fundamental.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I mean civilians.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Can you find civilian doctors to go into these hospitals and do that work, and go into the Air Service and in the Tank Corps?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. If you need doctors, why not report a bill for the doctors, and not include these other officers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman will take the trouble to read the report and add the additional officers allowed to the Medical Corps, and to the Quartermaster Corps, and the liquidating commissions, and to the claims boards, and to the Judge Advocate General's Department, and to the Tank Corps, and the Chemical Corps, and the Motor Transport Corps he will see that there is not an additional officer provided for in this bill and allowed to the Infantry, Cavalry, or Coast Artillery. It is just to clean up the work. That is all.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I would remind my colleague on the committee that there are about 190,000 civilians that have been employed and are now employed to take the places of enlisted men who were clamoring to be demobilized and discharged.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and another point: I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of War, I believe, had the authority to keep officers in the service, and this bill will permit him to release men who are anxious to get out of the service and put in men who are willing to serve.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the gentleman received letters, urgent requests, from surgeons and doctors in the various hospitals who come from his district, telling him that there are numerous doctors and surgeons, a surplus of them, in almost every nospital in the country, and urging him to get them out of the service? Is not that the fact?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not doctors.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the gentleman received letters from surgeons telling him that there is a surplus of surgeons in almost every hospital in the country?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I have great faith in the medical service of our Army. I have repeated on the floor of this House several times that that is one branch that came out of this war with an excellent record. Thanks to the patriotism and skill of the civilian doctors who answered the call, our medical department went into the war with equipment and men and ranked above the medical department of any of our allies.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BAER. Is it not a fact that in this demobilization of the boards composed of doctors and physicians it requires more doctors now to examine these men than it did in taking them into the Army, because it requires careful examination to serve as safeguard against pensions and everything that can occur in the future?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly; because we want to be sure of their physical condition when they are sent home.

Mr. BAER. Because we want to protect ourselves against claims for pensions and everything of that sort.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly. Now, this is a temporary provision. I certainly would not support this bill if it were a permanent provision. The whole Army is undergoing reorganization. We have this vast amount of property to take care of. We have these records to take care of, and this is necessary in the cleaning-up process of a big Army of 4,000,000 men. I have gone into the matter very carefully, and I deemed it my duty to support the bill. No one in the War Department will be able to avoid responsibility by claiming that there were insufficient officers. And no one can expect mercy if he does not make good on the job. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman from Virginia use some of his time?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I was at lunch when the House took this matter up, and I thank my good friend from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] for yielding me this time.

I can not approve this bill. I voted against it as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I am going to vote against it here. [Applause.] It occurs to me that it is time for the American Congress to realize that the war is ended and that our country is crying to be restored to a peace basis, so that all of the citizens who have been voluntarily or involuntarily forced into the service of their country during this horrible struggle shall soon be back following productive and peaceful pursuits.

This bill provides 18,000 officers, for what? It is for the purpose of having a larger number of men under them. The more officers you establish, the more private soldiers you are going to have in the Army in this country. [Applause.] It is of no use for us to endeavor to fool ourselves. I am going to call on you gentlemen to study the bill that is now before our committee, and I am going to appeal to your judgment, in the interest of the people of this country, whether or not such a thing as that should be put through this Congress. I take it you assume that the President of the United States is behind that bill of the General Staff and the Secretary of War, judging from statements of the Secretary of War to the Senate committee. They have proposed to have 576,000 privates in the Regular Army of this country and at least 700,000 in the reserve army in time of peace. They have proposed, in addition to that, to have conscription under the euphonious name of universal military training, taking every young man when he reaches the age of 19 years and putting him in a military camp and training him to be a soldier and then putting him into what they call the reserve army for two years. More than that, they expect to have every year 800,000 men conscripted and trained. They propose to conscript under the euphonious appellation of a selective draft the number required beyond the volunteers to make these 576,000 privates and numerous and numberless officers over them. They propose that outrage in time of peace. My goodness, think of it! We went out over this country making Liberty bond speeches and spurring our people to patriotic efforts, telling them that after this war was over, as the President of the United States and all of those around him said, there would be disarmament and the reduction of big armies not only in our country, but all over the world.

That is what all of us did during this war. I did it and I was honest in it. Four and one-half million of our young men patriotically served their country. Many of them are lying across the sea under the daisies, never to return to this country except in coffins. My friends, our boys did their part. Now will we do ours? When this war is over, when this whole country is crying for labor, the Secretary of War and the General Staff have sent a bill before the committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, and they have sent before the Senate committee a bill which they expect this Congress to pass making the General Staff of this country a replica of the Prussian general staff that brought on this horrible conflict across the sea. They propose the biggest Army that the United States ever heard of in time of peace; they propose compulsory military training of all young men and conscription in peace times; and they propose this after all the statements that were made that we would not have any big Army or big Navy any more.

Not only that, but we were assured that by the league of nations we would not need any great big Army. Yet in the face of the fact that they say the league of nations is going to be approved and organized and the treaty of peace ratified, our committee is called on and you are called on to put a standing Army of 576,000 privates, yea, 1,250,000 privates, and many, many thousands of officers upon the people of this country. Why, the bill provides that there shall be 87 brigadier generals, 36 major generals, 6 lieutenant generals, and the number of lieutenants, captains, and corporals are as the sands of the seashore. Hold your breath and think of such a thing in times of peace! Place that kind of an Army on this country in time of peace, make the taxpayers of this country bear a burden of at least $2,000,000,000 a year in order to support and maintain such an establishment as that. How will you be fulfilling your promises?

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I would rather not yield. I would rather discuss this now, because I am very much in earnest. The American people ought to know what is going on, because the propaganda is out on the other side of this question. I am here as the Representative of an honest constituency and I am speaking my honest convictions regardless of what Mr. Secretary Baker or anybody else may say; and I, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, am not going to support this outrage, as I consider it, upon the American people. [Applause.] I am not going to vote for it, and I am going to do my best to put it in the wastebasket. Here, with the farmers of the country needing labor, it is proposed by legislation in time of peace to take 800,000 of our young men out of their work, off the farms and out of the factories, every year and place them in military camps to be trained for soldiers.

And then you understand they are to be put in the reserve Army and kept there for two years, with the power in the President of the United States to call them out into active service and send them anywhere. Let me show you something else. This monster provides that if an emergency arises the same old conscription act that was put on the books in 1917 shall be effective without Congress saying a word, except that Congress shall declare war. They expect you in this bill to enact a conscript law that will be effective all the time in the future.

They further put in this bill that you are to have 800,000 boys every year trained, put back in what they call the reserve, which would make 3,200,000 soldiers subject to call at any time after the first two years.

Mr. KEARNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield now. The others are ready to be called. Such power as that was never invested in the General Staff nor in the Kaiser of Germany in the palmiest days of Prussianism.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not. The plain people of this country are called upon through their Representatives in time of peace to put this monstrous legislation on the statute books of this country. I appeal to you men to back us members of the committee who are going to fight that proposition. I ask you as representatives of the plain people to stand back of the men of the committee to keep this serpent from raising its deadly head and throwing its poisonous fangs into the body politic. [Applause.] If we are going to be only a servile set of men, bowing down to the interests of the War Department, turning the country into a military despotism instead of remaining a republican government of the people, you may enact this legislation and the day of democratic government will be ended on this continent.

Do you believe the American people would indorse such a bill as is proposed, such a bill as is pending in the Senate today, such a bill as the committee of the House is called upon to have hearings on and listen to all the arguments in favor of it?

If the men who stand for the people of this country will unite themselves and let that Military Committee know what the sentiments of their constituents are, we can kill this bill in committee, where it ought to die and sleep forever. But if we let the propaganda of the militarists go through, the papers every day carrying headlines, they will do the job and put it across.

Another thing, just about the time that they will have the fire built underneath the members of the committee, trying to force the bill out of committee, they are going to have a big scare that Mexico is going to come over here and swallow us. If they can not get that old Mexican scarecrow revived, they will say that Japan is going to come over and take us. There never was a time when the militarists could not stalk out a ghost and prove a lie. [Applause.] They are going to do it just as soon as this bill comes up.

So, my friends, it is time for all of you to put on the armor and stand by the plain people that sent you here. It is the duty of the American manhood in this Congress to see that the people are protected from such an outrage as this, regardless of who the Secretary of War or General Staff is that sends it down here. [Applause.]

There is no mistake about this; we may just as well assert the rights of the people. If the time comes when an emergency arises that our people need the protection of a large Army, there would not be a man on the committee more ready to give it to them than would I. But in a time of peaceful pursuits, when the Secretary of War and the General Staff propose to establish the greatest Army that we ever had, I feel that every speech I made during the war and every pledge I made to the people was of no avail. I would feel that 95 per cent of the speeches of this country that were made to get the people to subscribe to Liberty bonds that we needed to win the Great War were futile. Instead of that, after we have crushed the military power of Germany with our boys that were called to fight against militarism and Prussianism, we are now called upon to establish the same system in our own country, except we are establishing it on a greater and more magnificent scale.

What a stupendous idea—3,850,000 men conscripted and trained in peace times, to be called by the President of the United States any time that the emergency might arise, and you would have these men all conscripted in advance.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. No; I can not. I can not for one moment dream that the people would indorse the American Congress in any such act in a time of peace. It would be a stench in the nostrils of the patriotic people of the country.

Another thing, all through the United States we have 10,000,000 colored people, whom we call negroes in my country. Under this bill they would take these negroes, every youth who had reached the age of 19, and put him into training camps with an American Army uniform on him and train him to be a soldier, train him to shoot, and then put him back into the reserve and let him be a menace to the South or any other section of the country he happened to be in in great numbers.

It is enough to make every representative on the floor of this House rise up and take notice that aside from the expense of it, it means the taking of these young men out of their proper pursuits in life, where they are needed every day. It would mean about 1,400,000 strong young men taken away from productive pursuits, at a great expense and a great loss in production, which would be bound to raise the cost of living. They are seeking to put upon us an institution that will bring about in this country more strife and turmoil. The people of the country will say to Congress that it has played them false; that Congress promised that if we won this war we were going to do away with big armies, and that, notwithstanding that promise, we have gone to work and established a monster Army and conscripted the sons of the country in a time of peace, to take them away from their ordinary pursuits and put them, by act of conscription, into the Army of 576,000 privates. Oh, you know the scheme. We could not get over 150,000 men in the Regular Establishment by volunteering. That has been our history.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Or rather for a statement. The gentleman is not arguing about this bill. He is arguing about the proposed reorganization bill.

Mr. QUIN. Certainly, I am. I want the people to know what you are leading up to under this bill. [Laughter and applause.] You are just naturally laying the predicate right now under this 18,000-officer bill for this outrageous scheme to conscript over 576,000 men out of the reserve every year to make up this Regular Army. You need not disturb yourself about that.

Mr. KEARNS. I heartily agree with the gentleman on the proposed reorganization bill, but he is not talking about this bill.

Mr. QUIN. Yes, I am. You gentlemen are laying the predicate with your 18,000 officers to be appointed by the War Department, and Mr. Baker will come in and say, "We have the officers, now we want some more men." [Laughter and applause.] There is no doubt about that. The American people are going to know what is going on, and all of these newspapers, all of these kept papers that have been paid to carry the big military news, are going to spread that propaganda. The proposed bill intends to kill the National Guard. I am for a very strong National Guard in every State of this Union. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Could not the gentleman give me a little more time? I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not the time to yield.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time was fixed in the House, and, of course, it is not competent for the committee to extend the time.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that irrespective of the time fixed by the House the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not put that request, as it would be a violation of the rules of the House.

Mr. QUIN. I do not want to violate the rules of the House. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the Pershing bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the American Legion, the bill passed yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the speech just made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] is very opportune. It is a good speech, a commendable speech. I am not surprised that the gentleman is amazed at the military program proposed by his administration. I am not surprised that he is amazed that the President, just home with the league of nations under his arm, preaching peace and good will to all men, has acquiesced in the plan proposed by the War Department for the establishment and maintenance of the greatest professional Military Establishment ever proposed in America. Over 500,000 professional soldiers are proposed by this administration at a time when we are told that wars are to cease and peace is to reign throughout the world, an establishment which on the basis of the estimates made by the War Department itself would cost more annually than the entire expenditure of the Federal Government under Republican administrations before the war. Certainly he is amazed. Every reasonable citizen is.

I am not a member of the Military Committee and I am not prepared to speak for that committee, but I want to suggest to the gentleman that in my opinion he need have no fear that this Congress or the Republican majority in this Congress will propose a Military Establishment of over 500,000 professional soldiers [applause] or an establishment that will cost——

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. It is 576,000 and not 500,000.

Mr. MONDELL. It is worse than I thought it was, and Heaven knows it was bad enough as I understood it. The gentleman may be assured in advance that this Congress, at least the Republican side of it, will not approve a military program that will cost over a billion dollars a year to maintain.

The gentleman referred to the budding propaganda in behalf of this kind of an enormous Military Establishment. We have seen it. We have not yet reached the yellow peril end of it to which the gentleman referred, but the Mexican side of the propaganda is well under way. After eight years of watchful waiting and miserable intermeddling, during which American lives and property have not been safe for a moment anywhere in Mexico, the administration is now apparently giving out a carefully prepared propaganda suggesting intervention. A gentleman named Fox has been laying the groundwork for some days of what the administration seems to have in mind to do. There is to be no more vacillation, no more alternate support now of Villa and then of Carranza, sometimes of both and sometimes of neither.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. But real vigorous action, we are told—that is what is proposed now, and this morning's Washington Post contained what is apparently an inspired article outlining a plan of intervention in Mexico. Under the Constitution, Congress has a right to declare war, but here we have a suggested plan of war that reads as though inspired from the White House.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman to insist that Mr. Fox speaks for the administration?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know Mr. Fox.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman said it was an inspired article.

Mr. MONDELL. No; I did not say that Mr. Fox's articles were inspired. I said the article this morning reads as though inspired.

Mr. GARNER. Evidently inspired by the White House.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not say the Fox articles were inspired. I did not say that, but I did say that the article in this morning's Post, which was not Mr. Fox's article, was evidently an inspired article, and I ask the gentleman from Texas to read it, and he is so honest and conscientious that I shall not ask him whether or not it sounds to him like an inspired article for fear the question might embarrass him.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman in perfect frankness that I read the article to which he refers, and I do not believe that it was inspired by the administration. I do not think that the gentleman ought to put that statement, if the gentleman will pardon me for saying——

Mr. MONDELL. I said it was an apparently inspired article. It certainly sounded so to me. I can not understand how anyone would write in the vein in which that article is written unless what they said was inspired from high official sources.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Wyoming is bound to understand and bound to know, as he has said he has read Mr. Fox's article, that it is manufactured propaganda against the administration, and has been for some weeks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. I can not agree with the gentleman in regard to the Fox articles, but the one I last referred to was not a Fox article. It is an article bearing all the earmarks of inspiration, and it points as plainly as can be to an effort on the part of the administration to create a situation under which Congress may be compelled to act. If that is not a reasonable inference from the reading of that article, I do not know what inference one can properly draw.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman mean to charge specifically that the article to which he refers was inspired?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman heard what I said.

Mr. BEE. Say it again.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman may put any construction on it he desires. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I can not yield. I have but 10 minutes. No one who has followed the newspapers and has carefully read the articles appearing from day to day but what is driven to the conclusion that the administration is carefully planting the seed and adroitly endeavoring to create a sentiment in favor of intervention in Mexico. So much for that. When we shall have the propaganda relative to the yellow peril in behalf of the enormous professional Military Establishment that this alleged peace-loving administration is proposing, I do not know.

Mr. Chairman, I now desire to address myself to this bill. I shall vote for it, but without any enthusiasm, and I shall vote for it for the reason that I imagine actuated the members of the Committee on Military Affairs in supporting it. They realize that the wholly indefensible attitude of the War Department has probably created a situation under which it is necessary for Congress to act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Can the gentleman yield me five minutes additional?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Everybody knows that it is an effort of the War Department to "pass the buck" to Congress. Everybody knows, who is familiar with the situation, that the Secretary of War has now full authority and will have probably quite to the limit of the period during which this bill is to remain in force, to retain as many officers as he needs, but gentlemen also know that when Congress refused to provide the enormous appropriations the War Department asked that in a spirit of childish, puerile pique the Secretary of War signed a perfectly idiotic order for the separation of all emergency officers from the service on or before September 30. It is an unfortunate thing that Congress has to act to pull the War Department out of the miserable hole in which the Secretary plunged it by that wholly indefensible order, an order that anyone having any knowledge of the situation knew could not be carried out without infinite harm to the Military Establishment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But the Congress had seen fit to say in effect: "We limit your appropriation in order that in retaining the force you need if you create a deficiency you must give a good reason for doing it." Congress having done that, I presume the General Staff, that ought to be in better business, persuaded the Secretary to issue that senseless order that immediately brought confusion into the Military Establishment. Of course, that order can not be carried out. Taking advantage of the fact that we have need of many officers for our hospitals, to take care of Government property in the aviation and other special services, the War Department has placed Congress in the position where it must, in my opinion, authorize not necessarily this number of officers but a considerable number above the number allowed for the Regular Army in order to maintain the Military Establishment. In doing that do not let us forget we are giving the War Department authority to retain many general officers in rank above that which they held in the Regular Establishment. That we are authorizing them to maintain colonels in perhaps double the number that the Regular Establishment provides for, and that not one of those generals and few, if any, of the colonels will be an emergency officer or an officer of the National Army.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. If Congress has refused to make the appropriation, a Republican Congress, how can the Secretary make the additional officers?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. May I have one more minute?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Congress makes a small appropriation and now you expect the Secretary of War to justify you in doing it?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows perfectly well——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Secretary af War asked for 507,000 men.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). That the number of men provided for in this bill could probably be retained and paid for out of the appropriation that Congress has made if there was proper economy in other lines. The gentleman knows further that if this number of officers is needed the Secretary has authority to retain them, but the Secretary "passes the buck" to Congress. When the Secretary issued his order serving notice on all emergency officers to get out by September 30 they very naturally began to make arrangements for other employment. The best of them were the first to find other fields of usefulness. All were disturbed and unsettled. In the situation thus produced, not by lack of appropriations or act of Congress, but by a fool department order, Congress must step in to restore confidence. That, in a nutshell, is the situation. Congress saves the War Department from the effect of its own folly.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLE. Under the leadership of the gentleman from Wyoming this House has saved many millions the alleged military experts would have squandered. The distinguished leader, who has just addressed us, says he is going to vote for this bill, but without any enthusiasm. I am going to vote against it with all kinds of enthusiasm. [Applause.]

I have been very much interested in the address of the gallant soldier from New York, my friend Maj. LAGUARDIA, who I find opposed to my views on this occasion. A few weeks ago he rendered the people probably the greatest service any man has rendered them in any branch of this Congress at this session. He made the motion that knocked in the head this opportunity to establish an Army of 576,000 and a military despotism in this country. Now, after being on the committee a few months, he takes the position that we ought to have 12 officers for every soldier in this Army [laughter], because the Military Establishment demands that. He evidently yielded against his better judgment on the theory a few months of 6,000 extra officers might not do any real harm. I am reminded of the poem:

> Vice is a monster of such frightful mien,
> To be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

It is very curious to observe what a life on the Military Committee does for a man. But I know this gallant young soldier's heart is in the right place on all these topics.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows my associations.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman is all right. He will get over it. They will not. The Committee on Military Affairs is overrun by shoulder straps from the desks, but seldom gets to hear those from the firing line.

I look at this bill and I read the report, and I find that they want to have 2,877 doctors to handle 20,000 or 30,000 sick people next year. That will be a doctor for every 10 sick people. If we had in this House, regularly employed, 43 doctors to attend to us and do nothing else, we would be doing just what they want. If these people put in their time attending to these 10 soldiers, they could cut a leg off every other day. Is it possible that we want a physician for every 10 men for a year? What is going to be the matter with these fellows? If they are that sick, they will all be dead before the year is out.

I notice, also, that they want 234 judge advocate generals. A judge advocate general is a prosecuting attorney. This means 1 prosecuting attorney for every 1,000 people. I do not know how your States are, but down in our State about 20,000 people have a prosecuting attorney.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I would rather not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman wants to get the facts right. Most of these men are reviewing cases of which the gentleman so severely complains.

Mr. LITTLE. The most of them are reviewing cases of which I have been complaining? If there have been so many cases as that, I think we ought to discharge all these officers and begin over again. No, gentlemen; they want judge advocates, prosecuting attorneys, 234 of them, to attend to these 225,000 people, 1 to 1,000.

I go down here in their list and I find that they want 270 construction officers. If every construction officer handles a hundred men, we would have 27,000 men working in construction. What are you going to build? We have finished building. What do we need construction for? If it is to tear down, let the construction stand. It would be cheaper.

This is not a bill to do anything that ought to be done. This is a bill to enable 18,000 fellows that would like to work to hold out for another year. It would cost $15,000,000 to do this. You have just brought in a bill to give a $150 raise to postal clerks. Almost every one of those clerks has a family; every one of them is tied to a stake; and many a one is living beyond his means because he can not make his salary piece him out. If you want to use this amount of money, pay it to the postal clerks, and let these other fellows go home and work like all other boys do.

Every time you write a bill to reduce the Army you can hear the low, sad moan of the spur jingles, the man being separated from the only military weapon he ever knew, his pretty spurs. They want 6,000 men for construction. Who are they sending out? Do not flatter yourselves that they are going to keep the soldiers already in the Army. The soldiers that fought will be sent home. Last week Jerry Springsted came in to see me and said that he had been fired. He enlisted as a private in the Twentieth Kansas 20 years ago and fought in every battle that regiment had except one. He came home a war-scarred veteran, and spent seven years in the militia, and rose to be colonel, and then graduated in the schools run by these experts from West Point.

When this war began they promptly put him in and made him a major, and he was so valuable they kept him as a major in the construction department. But as soon as the war was over they told him to go home. Who fired him? Col. Trask. I asked him how many they were keeping, and he said "Sixty." "How many of them fought?" "Not a one." I said, "Why do not you see Trask?" He said, "I did." Jerry said to Trask, "Does not military service count for anything, other things being equal?" Trask answered him, "Damned little."

That is the kind of people they are keeping and the men they are sending home. I wrote Trask. I thought as little of his opinion as he did of military service, and sent a copy of my letter to the Secretary of War, asking whether that was the department's policy. He said to me that he thought the Trask remark was "intemperate," but that he would investigate. A week has gone by and I have not heard since. Jerry came in this morning and said he was going home on the 2d, and I wrote the Secretary to know whether Trask was going home or Jerry was going home. What is the purpose of this appropriation to keep in 6,000 officers who can not fight and would not fight? You admit that these officers are not to command; that they are simply to draw salaries, wear spurs and straps, and take charge of stores of supplies and strut around. All this is civilians' work, to be much better done by civilians. Why build up officers in the Army not to fight?

Why does not this bill provide for Sergt. York and his kind—fighting men? This bill does not keep men of that kind in the Army. This is a bill to keep spur jinglers in the Army, men who wear uniforms which they never dared to carry into battle, men holding soft jobs who could not make a living at home, including doctors sometimes. A doctor at Fort Sill said to a man who brought in a letter from Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, "You bring in a letter from any more damned civilians and you will be sorry for it." I asked him if he had used that language, and he denied it. I got three affidavits from men who heard him, among them one who was the son of the secretary of the governor of Kansas, whom I know well, and he said he heard him say it. That is the class of men this legislation would favor. We can not afford to squander money like military experts.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. How is the gentleman going to reconcile his position with that taken by the caucus the other night?

Mr. LITTLE. The caucus did not do any such thing about military legislation as the papers said it did.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. He is a pretty good talker.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the time for debate was fixed in the House, and it is not competent for the committee to extend the time.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope the Chair will not force me to appeal from his decision. There is no rule that does away with unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair declines to put the request for unanimous consent under the circumstances.

Mr. LITTLE. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the appeal lie on the table.

Mr. LITTLE. I make that appeal, Mr. Chairman, and the motion is now to lay it on the table.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has the floor [Mr. LITTLE] has nothing to appeal from.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not recognized for the purpose of making any motion. He has not the floor. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has the floor.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, the rule adopted in the House provided for the distribution of the time?

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair ruled.

Mr. KAHN. And the committee, as I understand it, can not change the rule adopted by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LITTLE. I have got leave to revise and extend. Just read the RECORD in the morning. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, let us for a few moments consider the bill that is under consideration. When the war was at its height there were 188,000 officers engaged. The armistice came on, and they have demobilized up to the present time until there are now 32,000 officers. Unless you pass this bill, they have in the next month to demobilize the officers until there will be less than 12,000.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Under the law as it exists on the statute books, can not the Secretary of War continue in the service just as many officers as he has money to pay for?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think that he can; not if he carries out the already expressed wishes of Congress.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] just made that statement a few moments ago, that under the present law the Secretary of War could continue in the service as many officers as he had money to pay for.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is just exactly what we are trying to avoid, so that the men who are in the service and want to get out can get out, and the men who are willing to serve can come in and serve.

Mr. GARNER. It is a question with the Secretary of War; and yet you are coming in here and asking us to confirm and say——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I did not yield my time for the gentleman to make a speech. That is what we do not want the War Department to do—to do something that we have tried to prevent. On the floor of this House, under the leadership of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], we set the size of the Army at 225,000. That makes about 12,000 officers in the Army, and if they, under any subterfuge, increase that number, they are doing indirectly what we asked them not to do. That is the very thing that we ought not to allow the War Department to do. They have come fairly to Congress and called our attention to a condition which we created, and we ought to be men enough to meet it. [Applause.] They asked us to give them about 7,000 officers to take care of $6,500,000,000 worth of property, and some men on this floor hesitate to do it. They are fair with us. Let us be fair with them. Let us create a better condition between the War Department and the administration and Congress. There has been too much in the past of this subterfuge and doing things that Congress directed them not to do. We have asked them not to carry more than 12,000 officers, and they have asked us for 6,500 additional officers to take care of this property, and we should be men and grant it to them at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, a question. How does it happen that the War Department did not furnish this data before?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, how many more speeches has the gentleman on the other side?

Mr. HARRISON. We have only five minutes left on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything in regard to this bill, but in view of the character of support it has received from some of its advocates, and representing in part the Democratic members of the committee, I feel it incumbent on me to set out briefly the reasons I am heartily for the bill.

In the Military Affairs Committee the bill had the support of every Republican member and every Democratic member, except the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. The passage of the bill is made necessary by the failure of Congress to make the necessary appropriations in the Army appropriation bill. If the Republican leadership in the House had been less anxious to make a great showing of economy, when the appropriation bill was under consideration, this bill would not have been necessary. As a relief for his feelings in support of this necessary supplemental legislation the Republican leader criticizes the President and the Secretary of War. The Republican floor leader [Mr. MONDELL] carries his criticism to the extent of quoting the propaganda he finds in the Republican press, and claiming that it is inspired by a Democratic President.

Mr. LITTLE. The Washington Post is not a Republican paper, is it?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. What is it? If it is not a Republican paper it can very well pass for it, judging from its editorials.

Mr. LITTLE. It does not pass for it over here.

Mr. HARRISON. It is not a Democratic paper, and is certainly not an inspired organ of the administration, and I do not believe any responsible paper of this country ever has acted in such a capacity.

The bill provides for the retention in the service of about 6,000 officers. The Regular Establishment, as provided in the national-defense act, requires 12,000, and for the temporary purposes of winding up the war status 6,000 additional officers are asked, and the hearings before the committee demonstrate that this additional number is absolutely needed. It provides simply for a temporary force of 6,000 officers until the Army can be properly demobilized. Gentlemen of the House before voting against this bill should read the hearings before the committee.

And yet the gentleman from Wyoming says, "The Secretary of War has the right to retain these officers and should go ahead and exercise this right," that he is passing the buck up to Congress, or words to that effect. The gentleman knows that this Congress failed to provide the appropriation, and the Secretary would violate the law if he paid these additional officers out of funds not provided for that purpose.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Suppose that under the appropriation that Congress made in the last Army bill the Secretary of War should demobilize the Army down to 150,000 men. Would he not have enough money left to pay 18,000 officers for the rest of this fiscal year?

Mr. HARRISON. If he provided for an Army below the number required in the national-defense act, he would be violating the law.

Mr. GARNER. That is 175,000 men.

Mr. HARRISON. That is 175,000 combat troops, with the additional auxiliary corps, which brings the number up to the 225,000 men, to which the Army is being demobilized. And yet when the War Department has reduced this Army down to 225,000 men it finds it must have 6,000 additional officers, who are necessary for the temporary purposes of the Government. It is the duty of the Secretary to obtain, if practicable, the officers which the Regular Establishment requires, and if he discharged these he would be violating the law and neglecting the duty which it imposes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have only five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not had any time.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I will ask the gentleman to take his time when he can get it. I happened to get this five minutes. [Laughter.]

I do not understand, either, gentlemen, the hostility which this House seems to evince to the officers of the Army. The lack of trained officers was our greatest handicap in the war. If we are to have an efficient Army, we must have competent and trained officers. I want to say that I am as utterly opposed as is the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] to anything like a standing Army of 500,000 men. [Applause.] This not the time to discuss the problems of Army reorganization, but whatever the Regular Establishment may be I shall certainly favor a sufficient number of trained and competent officers to meet any present or future emergency. I do not know of any member of the Military Affairs Committee who is in favor of anything that approaches compulsory military service in time of peace unless it be my friend from California [Mr. KAHN] [applause], who is, as I understand, in favor of compulsory military training of youths.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 24 minutes remaining.

Mr. KEARNS. I yield that time to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, in dealing with military matters I have always tried to be absolutely fair. I do not believe that there should be partisanship in military matters. The defense of the Nation is the concern of every citizen, be he Republican or Democrat or Prohibitionist or what not. It is the concern of every one of us, and so I try to treat these matters in a fair, straightforward manner.

Under the law passed in February, 1919, by the last Congress, the Secretary of War was authorized to enlist the Regular Army by voluntary enlistment up to the figure of approximately 225,000 men, of whom approximately 175,000 are combat troops and 50,000 are auxiliaries. The War Department has, up to the present time, as I understand, enlisted about 104,000 men under that law. These men are being gradually put into the service to take the places of the men who were drafted or who volunteered for the war.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. For a very brief one.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska How did it happen that these extra items were not fully covered in the last Army appropriation bill?

Mr KAHN. I do not quite catch the drift of the question, except that I imagine the gentleman means these various branches of the service which are not covered under general law. Is that right?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understand this bill is to supplement the appropriations and authorizations made in the last Army bill.

Mr. KAHN. No; the last Army bill provided for an average force of 325,000 men for the year, but a force that would be gradually reduced to 225,000 men by the end of September, and would continue at 225,000 until the 1st of next July.

Under the national-defense act there is no provision at all for an air service. The Aviation Corps, which was provided in that law, was attached to the Signal Corps; it was only an adjunct to the latter. But Congress continued the Air Service as a regular branch of the military service until June 30, 1920. So also it continued the Tank Corps, the Chemical Warfare Corps, the Construction Corps, and the Motor Transport Corps. Of course, to continue these special services which Congress ordered the War Department to continue we will have to provide officers that are not provided for under the national-defense act.

In addition to that, we face a very peculiar situation. It only happens after a great war. Vast amounts of property are purchased in every branch of the departments of the service in order to supply the men, the fighting force, and the men in the auxiliary force, with the necessary supplies and equipment. Our Ordnance Department is enormously expanded in time of war. It takes a long time to make the heavy guns that are needed by the Government in the war, to make the ammunition that is needed, and it requires an enormous number of additional officers to carry out the plans of the department and see that the necessary fighting material is properly produced.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is making the only real argument I have heard up to this time in favor of the bill. I understand the gentleman that under the national-defense act we will have to have additional officers to those authorized by the national-defense act.

Mr. KAHN. Until the 30th of June, 1920.

Mr. GARNER. After that time will it not take additional officers for the different units which were not arranged for?

Mr. KAHN. It is the purpose of the Military Committee, and it is the desire of the War Department, that that committee draft legislation for an entire reorganization of the Army, and under that reorganization bill the permanent status of the officers and men of the Army will be fixed. This is only a temporary matter.

Mr. GARNER. From the gentleman's argument I deduce that we will have to have an increased percentage of officers.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; we will have to have more officers at this time and during this period than we will have in ordinary times. The gentleman is quite correct.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to ask about one item in the list, if the gentleman can advise us. What increase is there in the number of officers in the Air Service? There are 965 provided for, and I should like to know what the increase is.

Mr. KAHN. I believe in the Air Service 235 officers are provided under existing law.

Mr. BEGG. That makes an increase of 730.

Mr. KAHN. Practically 1,000, because we are giving them 1,200 in all in the Air Service. I want to say to the gentleman, in all fairness, that the War Department has claimed that it has taken a great deal of money to train these fliers. I am told that the amount is probably $30,000 for the training of every flier. Now, it has been contended that these men will leave the service if this legislation is not passed, and they will not have any of these fliers left in the Air service. With 200 or 300 in all it would be a terrible crippling of the service.

Mr. BEGG. Can the gentleman further enlighten us as to how many men are in the service—how many have we in the service?

Mr. KAHN. I want to say that when the legislation came before the Military Committee originally we were novices in matters affecting warfare in the air. The Secretary of War, as I recall, said it practically required 30 men on the ground for every plane that was in the service in the air. I take it for granted that that proportion has not been materially reduced. These men are largely mechanics.

Now, I want to say further that there are 18 machines to every squadron; that is, machines that ought to be actually in use, but experience has taught us that we must have at least 1 additional machine for emergency, so that the squadron really has 36 flying machines.

Mr. BEGG. If I may I would like to inquire what these 30,000 men are going to do in face of the fact that a news story was carried a few days ago, apparently from the War Department, when there was trouble threatened by Mexico, that they did not have any aeroplanes.

Mr. KAHN. It is a mistake, for they have a great many aeroplanes. However, not as many as we hoped to have, but we have no pursuit planes at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We have aeroplanes fit to use in Mexico, but we could not use them anywhere where we would have anything against us in the air.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I understand there are only 15 aeroplanes, all told, in the armies of Mexico, so that Mexico does not present a serious problem in that connection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not a fact that a considerable number of officers in the Regular Establishment are still incapacitated from wounds and sickness?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If so, how many?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has called attention to a very important matter. Of the inmates of our hospitals, of the 30,000 that have been spoken of here, 1,200 are officers in the Regular Establishment, and their places will have to be supplied temporarily until they recover from their wounds, or from the diseases with which they are afflicted. Surely this House does not want these wounded and sick officers to be under a strain constantly because they may fear there may be no one in the service to take their places during their illness.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the report of the committee shows that there are 1,800 officers in the hospital.

Mr. KAHN. The number is more than I had thought. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri and to the committee that this temporary increase of officers does not carry a single officer in the Infantry, the Cavalry, the Artillery, the Coast Artillery, the Philippine Scouts, or similar branches of the service.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. There is no request for any increase in any department that would ever be shot at, is there?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Which one?

Mr. KAHN. Let me say to the gentleman that men in the Medical Department laid down their lives under fire in this very war and the records disclose the fact. [Applause.]

Mr. VAILE. And the first officer killed in this war was an officer in the Medical Department.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. LITTLE. He was from my State.

Mr. KAHN. I decline to yield further.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman [Mr. LITTLE] seems to be ashamed of the fact.

Mr. KAHN. I want to be perfectly fair.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call the attention of the gentleman to the Motor Transport Corps. The report shows that they have 543 officers.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. That corps has been in existence only about a year.

Mr. KAHN. It was organized during the war. I stated there is no provision for that branch of the service under existing law in the Regular Army. Of course, it has been created out of the necessities arising during the war. It had a very large number of officers and men—had to have.

Mr. CONNALLY. Too many officers.

Mr. KAHN. I am not prepared to argue that with the gentleman, but I call his attention to the fact that the laws which have been passed by Congress authorize the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army to fix the proportion of officers and men in all technical branches of the War Department during the war.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suppose the gentleman is aware that there is a bunch of these motor transport officers out on a joy ride to the Pacific coast at the present time, is he not?

Mr. KAHN. I understand there is a transport convoy that is making the trip across the continent to the Pacific coast, in order to develop some important information for the War Department. I want to say to my friend, whom I met over on the other side, that the transport service of this country performed an invaluable work for our country in bringing our soldiers, time and again, from one place in the fighting area to another place where they were sadly needed; and any army which we may constitute in the future will, in my opinion, not be without a very considerable army transport corps.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, but that condition does not exist out on the Pacific coast at present, does it?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know anything about the condition on the Pacific coast.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if my friend will permit me, Gen. Drake, who is chief of this Board of Transport Corps, told me that one of the reasons for this corps going across the country to California was not only to subserve a useful purpose in testing out the value of such trucks and machines, but he stated that they had a number of these trucks that had to be sent to the Pacific coast and they could send them cheaper overland than they could by freight.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether next year they will not clean up the work——

Mr. KAHN. Of course, it is an unusual condition that confronts us. As was stated by the gentleman from Ohio, the latest figures of the War Department indicate that they have $6,500,000,000 worth of property that will have to be taken care of, that will have to be guarded closely and properly protected. Of course, a large force of officers will be required to look after those things. The gentleman, I think, from Kansas spoke of officers in the Judge Advocate General's Department. Those officers are going over the cases of courts-martial, reviewing them, and assuredly the House wants that work thoroughly gone over, because much has been said of the injustice——

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield? Why do we want to go over it now?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should not interrupt the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. KAHN. Gentlemen will readily understand that these matters ought to be well looked into. There are many thousands of cases that are being investigated. Then there are matters of claims that the Judge Advocate General's Department is considering now—the rights of people of foreign territory and their property that was destroyed are being investigated and determined. There are thousands of those cases; the Judge Advocate General's Department is handling those matters, and, by the way, I want to say to my friend from Texas, Mr. GARNER, that there are no enlisted men in that branch of the service at all. They are all officers in that branch, and they are all officers in the Inspector General's Department and several other branches of the bureaus of the War Department, so it is not fair to say that one officer commands 12 men. That condition does not exist.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman permit this suggestion, too, in line with what he says? Perhaps there is a popular tendency to confuse the military title which we are wont to associate with military men when it is applied to many not strictly military officers. The rank of a second lieutenant, first lieutenant, captain, and so on, while given in the Military Establishment, in a manufacturing establishment or similar occupation in private life would be held by men who were called superintendents and foremen and paid accordingly, and these ranks are intended to fix the pay in such cases.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield.

Mr. LITTLE. I would like to know why these men who have nothing on earth to do but fill civilian jobs should be dignified with shoulder straps and officers' epaulettes when everybody knows that they are never going to fight?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, that is a pertinent question. There are many men who do not see why men should be commissioned when a civilian seemingly could do the same thing; but an officer is under the Articles of War and a civilian is not. It is imperative, especially in war times, that officers rather than civilians do those things so that they can be held amenable to the Articles of War if they violate the laws of government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And this rank simply fixes the scale of pay in more or less correspondence to civil employment.

Mr. KAHN. That is all. I would like to say that I would like to have had the opportunity to read a letter which was sent to me by the Secretary of War, and which is very illuminating, on this question. I shall ask unanimous consent, however, to revise and extend my remarks, and shall insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California ask unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say that I have tried to explain orally and as briefly as I could the main features of the propositions that he has given in the letter while I was on my feet. Usually I do not favor legislation that would in ordinary times expand the War Department to an unnecessary number of officers. But to get down to a peace basis and to conserve the property rights of the country, to look after the sick soldiers, I think we would be making no mistake by giving these 6,250 additional officers for this emergency until June 30, 1920. [Applause.]

The letter from the Secretary of War is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 25, 1919.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: 1. On July 25 I wrote you a letter giving certain general reasons why during the year which will end June 30, 1920, there will be required, in order to enable the Military Establishment properly to perform its functions, a number of officers greater than that authorized by the national defense act of June 3, 1916, and inclosing for your consideration the draft of a bill which, if passed, would enable me to retain until June 30, 1920, not to exceed 18,000 commissioned officers on the active list. In support of that bill I, in due course, at your invitation, appeared before the committee of which you are chairman.

2. From subsequent comment made by Members of the House of Representatives, evidently in good faith, and some by the public press, it is manifest that there are probably many by whom the existing situation is not clearly understood. The interests affected are nation wide. It is therefore imperative that any such misunderstanding should be cleared up, to the end that the bill may be considered absolutely upon its merits. The purpose of this letter is to review the facts from a business standpoint.

3. As soon as the armistice was signed the War Department became immediately confronted by three problems:

First. The discharge and return to civil life as rapidly as possible of about 4,000,000 men, all of whom, with the exception of about 50,000, were, by the terms of their engagement with the Government, entitled to the earliest practicable release.

Second. The liquidation of plant and of property of an enormous number of different classes, of a total value of over $6,500,000,000.

Third. With the 50,000 individuals referred to as a nucleus, the complete rebuilding of a permanent military force of whatever strength might be determined by Congress.

4. It is essential to emphasize that each of these problems, while necessarily affecting the other two, is, nevertheless, in the main distinct from them, and that the completion of any one of the three in itself in no way insures the completion of either of the other two.

5. Each of these three great pieces of work, together with the facilities necessary to complete it, will now be considered in turn.

6. Demobilization of personnel: In order to meet the urgent and natural demand that men who had been either enlisted or drafted into the military service between April 1, 1917, and November 11, 1918, should be returned to civil life with the least practicable delay, no effort has been spared to secure all available transportation with which to return the troops from overseas. As a result of these successful efforts the emergency military force has been reduced by August 16 to about 345,000 officers and men. By September 30 it is anticipated, that with the exception of about 80,000, all emergency enlisted men will have been discharged. The emergency men then remaining in the service will be the 30,000 physically unfit for discharge, the 8,000 trained medical personnel retained for their care, and about 25,000 who, on that date are either en route or in forces abroad, that have not yet been replaced by men who are being as rapidly as possible specifically enlisted for that purpose. That is to say, on that date the demobilization of emergency enlisted personnel will be about 98 per cent complete.

7. At this point I must emphasize strongly that under ordinary service conditions in the Regular Establishment, all work incident to the abandonment of any camp or post, and the sorting, storage, or other disposal of the public property and reserve supplies, etc., is done by the troops themselves. Early in the course of demobilization it became clear to me that if this usual course were pursued it would, owing to the enormous quantities of property on hand, involve there being retained in the service for that purpose for a long period about 250,000 men who could be released almost immediately provided this work could be done under some justifiable alternative plan. As a result, therefore, of careful consideration made in the month of February I authorized the release gradually, with three general exceptions, of all men otherwise eligible, who were performing work not essentially military in character, as soon as they could be replaced by civilians employed to do the specific work involved. The three general exceptions were those engaged in—

First. Feeding men being demobilized;

Second. Discharging men being demobilized; and Third. Caring for sick and wounded.

There have thus been released at various dates since March 1 about 250,000 men, who, had this action not been taken, would be in the service to-day, mostly in the supply departments, and who would have had to have been retained in the service for months to come.

8. In the work connected with the liquidation of plant and property they have been replaced by about 192,000 civilians. As it was found possible to make this replacement at a substantial saving to the Government it was justifiable not only from a demobilizing but also from a financial standpoint. The approximate completion of the demobilization of enlisted personnel by September 30, and not at a much later date, is therefore due to this civilian replacement and would have been absolutely impracticable until months later had this alternative plan not been adopted.

9. This replacement did not, of course, diminish the number of officers required to supervise work being done by the civilian force. Inevitably, therefore, the discharge of emergency officers could not, and has not, kept pace with the discharge of emergency enlisted personnel. For reasons that will appear later, consideration of this is deferred until after I shall have dwelt somewhat on the second and third problems above referred to.

Second. Liquidation of plant and property invested. Upon the signing of the armistice the War Department found itself in the position of a corporation which, to care for an extraordinary immediate and imperative demand, had acquired a physical plant and stock on hand greatly in excess of that necessary to meet its normal requirements. That extraordinary demand having been met, the observance of ordinary business principles demands that all portions of the plant not required for the corporation's permanent activities be salvaged or otherwise disposed of.

10. The plant and property to be liquidated to normal is, in round figures, distributed in charge of the several departments, as follows:

Utilities (Construction Division)	$300,000,000
Motor Transport Corps	225,000,000
Quartermaster Corps	2,000,000,000
Air Service	250,000,000
Ordnance Department	3,500,000,000
Miscellaneous	250,000,000

There are engaged in the work incident to the sorting, arranging for storage, shipment, division between reserve and disposal portions, etc., about 185,000 of the 192,000 civilian employees referred to in paragraph 6, supra. The pay roll of these employees amounts to over $18,500,000 per month. That the care and liquidation of this enormous mass of property and the great civilian force engaged therein require intelligence and competent supervision is, of course, not open to question.

11. Manifestly there are but two courses pursuable regarding such supervision, namely, first, to retain of the officers at present engaged therein a number sufficient for that purpose, or, second, as was done in the case of the enlisted men of the Staff Corps, to discharge all emergency officers serving in those corps and replace them by competent civilians. Aside from any others there are two serious objections to adopting the second course. These are, first, that in the midst of an operation of this magnitude it is, other things being equal, very undesirable to change the supervising force; and the second, as will be demonstrated later, that any civilian supervising force competent to undertake the work could only be obtained at an average salary per individual greatly in excess of the average salary per officer. Irrespective, therefore, of any other considerations, it is believed that it is to the best interest of the Government to pursue the first course; namely, to retain of the officers now engaged upon the work of liquidation a number sufficient to supervise its completion.

12. To determine what that number shall be, the responsible head of each organization of the Military Establishment has been called upon to submit an estimate of the minimum number of officers required to function his organization under the abnormal conditions that will continue during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, by which date it is hoped the liquidation of plant and property will be essentially completed. The aggregate of the estimates received from the heads of the department enumerated above is 7,268 officers as against an aggregate of 1,221 authorized under the national-defense act.

13. Under ordinary conditions, I question whether it is practicable for any civilian occupying my position to reach an intelligent independent opinion as to whether or not the number of officers asked for by the head of any staff corps or department is in excess of the number actually required. Under the present abnormal circumstances the large money values give a basis for comparison with similar responsibilities in commercial life. For the purpose of such comparison I invite attention to the following table, from which it will be seen that, as relates to the value of the property in charge, the heads of the several departments have asked for officers as follows:

Utilities	one for each	$1,000,000
Motor Transport Corps	do	330,000
Quartermaster Corps	do	600,000
Air Service (excluding 900 fliers and the value of their machines)	one for each	800,000
Ordnance Department	do	7,000,000

14. The number asked for in the pending bill, when distributed by grades as per memorandum herewith gives an aggregate cost equivalent to about $3,000 per officer per annum. I believe that you will agree with the opinion unanimously expressed by the heads of departments that it will be quite impracticable to obtain either in or from civilian life the required supervision at anywhere near that average figure. That it is possible to do so from the officers available for selection is due to the fact that among the thousands of emergency officers taken in from civil life during the war, and who are still in the service, there are many who, though thoroughly capable of earning far above this limit in civil life, have from association acquired a liking for the service sufficient to incline them to remain in, provided the financial sacrifice entailed be not too great.

15. Third. The reorganization of the military forces: As noted above, the completion of the demobilization of enlisted personnel left the permanent establishment with a nucleus of only about 50,000 enlisted men. The national-defense act fixes that strength at approximately 225,000 men. Congress in passing the recent appropriation bill provided for the continuation of five services not included in the national-defense act, namely, the Air Service, the Chemical Warfare Service, the Tank Corps, the Motor Transport Corps, and the Utilities (Construction Division). On the basis of an army of 225,000 in other arms, these five activities require the services of about 29,000 enlisted men. If it be the intention of Congress that the number so required shall be an addition to those provided for by the national-defense act, the strength of the Army during the coming year would thereby be increased to about 254,000 men. In any event, the War Department is confronted with the work during the months to come of enlisting and distributing among various units either 175,000 or 204,000 men.

16. The majority of those now being enlisted are men who served during the recent war. It is therefore fair to presume that individually they are well grounded in drill, in the use of their weapons, and in much other knowledge essential to military efficiency. It is a well-known fact, however, that in civil life an organization made up of stars hastily thrown together will generally be excelled or defeated by another organization composed of less brilliant men, but who are thoroughly trained to teamwork. Even more so is this true in the military service. It is the knowledge that each man has, based on continued acquaintance and association, that in an emergency he can depend on the man on his right and on the man on his left, and his confidence in the officers commanding him, that enables a military unit to accomplish its tasks with the minimum loss of life.

17. Opinions may readily differ as to what strength our Army should have, but all will agree that whatever its size, it should be thoroughly efficient. Conditions that are of public knowledge make it important that that state of efficiency should be reached with as little delay as possible. These conditions dictate that except during the present period of recruiting line officers should not be detached but should be continuously occupied in welding their respective units into trained efficiency.

18. As above stated (par. 15) Congress has approved the continuance until June 30, 1920, of the Air Service, the Chemical Warfare Service, the Motor Transport Corps, the Tank Corps, and the Utilities or Construction Division, organizations additional to those provided for in the national defense act. There were in these services August 1 an aggregate of 7,740 officers, of whom only 385—i. e., less than 5 per cent—belong to the Regular Establishment. If the continuance of these organizations is to be of any present value whatever it is the opinion of their chiefs that there must be retained during the fiscal year many of the trained specialists now serving as emergency officers. To do otherwise would be to throw away practically all that has been built up and start afresh. In short, it would defeat the purpose of the recent legislation continuing these organizations. The aggregate of estimates of chiefs of these organizations is 2,506 officers.

So much for the requirements incident to the three general problems.

19. Arising out of or correlated to these are many other problems, smaller in magnitude, but not in importance. To attempt to enumerate them would exceed the limits to which I feel I may extend this letter. I will, however, mention a few as illustrations:

Care of sick, wounded, etc.: There are at present in the hospitals, convalescent centers, and demobilization camps 1,800 officers, and, as has been noted above, 30,000 men, either sick, wounded, or undergoing reconstructional or other physical development. It is, of course, imperative that this medical attention and care should be given, and I have concurred in the view of the Surgeon General that there should be retained in his department a number of officers approximately double that allowed him by the national defense act.

Claims: The operations incident to raising and training the Army here and, to a lesser extent, to its work abroad, have necessarily given rise to an enormous number of claims. These in general are based either on the Government's desire to terminate contracts, or on damages necessarily done to private property by military forces or individuals acting under competent orders. These claims, in most cases, have just foundation. Simple fairness to the claimants, whether they be our own citizens or those of other countries, requires that these claims should be adjusted and settled with the least practicable delay. Such settlements can only be based on competent legal investigation and advice. This work, owing to its magnitude, far exceeds the capacity of the Judge Advocate General's force of 31 officers, authorized under the national defense act, to handle. There are at present in his department, here and abroad, engaged on these and other urgent legal matters, 330 officers.

Records: During the war approximately 4,000,000 men and officers have been inducted into the military service. Upon the completion of demobilization over 90 per cent will, even assuming reenlistments, have been separated permanently from the service. The record in each individual's case is the Government's prima facie evidence as to whether any claim he may make in the future has an equitable foundation. It is, therefore, clearly evident that these records should be properly completed, sorted, and filed. The Adjutant General's office is charged with this work. Again the abnormal task involved exceeds the capacity of the 50 officers authorized to him. Failure properly to perform this work would ultimately result in injustice either to the Government or to a great number of individuals.

General Staff: The solution of the three great problems and of the numerous secondary problems depends primarily upon the most careful coordination of the efforts of the various departments. This coordination it is only possible to insure through an efficient General Staff. I believe you will unquestionably agree with me that, from what has already been shown above, the work that will devolve upon that body for months to come is very much greater than twice and probably not less than three times that incident to coordinating the activities of an army of 225,000 men thoroughly trained, equipped, and functioning under normal conditions. It may not be amiss to add that, notwithstanding the fact that the number of oversea men discharged in the demobilization centers during the month of June was more than double that discharged in the same centers in the month of March, the successful efforts of the General Staff to secure more effective coordination reduced the gross cost of discharge for July below the gross cost of discharge in March by an amount that would pay the whole present General Staff for a period of four years.

20. Comment might readily be made relative to officers required for education and special training, camp administration, physical reconstruction, military intelligence, recruiting service, foreign liquidation and special missions, etc. It is believed, however, that the illustrations given will suffice.

21. Summarizing as to the need of the increased number of officers that I have asked be authorized, it should be noted—

First: That the number of officers authorized under the national defense act is 11,755.

Second. That based on the great volume of work to be done (as portrayed above), the aggregate of the estimates furnished me by the heads of the respective departments is 24,693.

Third. That the bill calls for an aggregate, including those authorized by the national-defense act, of 18,000, a number which, taking all the facts into consideration, I believe is the absolute minimum consistent with accomplishing the work economically and efficiently. In fact, I am frank to say that had I, at the time the bill was before me, had the detailed information that has since become available, I should have asked for 20,000.

22. The need of the number asked for having been established there remains to be considered a misunderstanding as to the necessity for this legislation. To that misunderstanding I have, I regret to say, unintentionally contributed. In the report of my hearing before the Military Committee, July, appears the following:

"Mr. GREENE. This question of having a sufficient officer list to take care of an army, whatever may be its size, is governed all the time by the regulations you set up on September 30; but by the continuance of the blanket power the Executive has the men can be continued in the service until he has officially proclaimed peace.

"Secretary BAKER. Yes.

"Mr. GREENE. So that even though when we arrived at the date of September 30 you find it impossible to get down to the lowest average to meet the appropriation, but find a necessity for continuing the emergency men, you can take the authority of that power the Executive has to continue such men as you may need and then bring in a supplemental deficiency estimate.

"Secretary BAKER. Clearly.

"Mr. GREENE. So that you are not really handicapped by any failure of legislation, as the law, regardless of the appropriation, authorizes the Executive to employ men and obligates Congress to pay them?

"Secretary BAKER. Yes. The embarrassment there is the creation of a deficiency, which I am anxious to avoid if possible.

"Mr. GREENE. It is not a positive obstacle to the employment of men?

"Secretary BAKER. No.

"Mr. GREENE. So that in that sense you are not handicapped?

"Secretary BAKER. No."

23. My replies on that occasion have probably given the impression that it was my opinion that under existing law I had the power to hold, not merely until the completion of demobilization of enlisted personnel but until the completion of the liquidation of the property (including other abnormal activities) whatever emergency officers might be required for that purpose. Bearing on that point, I have called upon the Judge Advocate General of the Army for an opinion as to exactly how long under existing law I am authorized to hold emergency officers. A copy of that opinion is appended. From that opinion it will be clear that I can hold emergency officers until the completion of liquidation, only provided that liquidation is completed either before or by the termination of the emergency.

24. I think that unquestionably you will agree with me that it is highly improbable that these two periods will be coterminous. To illustrate my meaning: It is my best judgment, based on the consensus of opinion of the department chiefs, that this liquidation will not be completed earlier than June 30, 1920. And when it is considered that the value of the property involved is probably not less than three times that of the Standard Oil Corporation at the time when it was given by the courts a year and a half to rearrange its affairs, I believe that that estimate will be admitted to be conservative.

25. The word "emergency" and the phrases "during the emergency" or "for the emergency," or some similar expression, appear in about 300 acts of Congress. Of these acts about two-thirds pertain to subjects not in any way connected with the Military Establishment. They affect so many great and diverse interests that it is manifest that the determination of the termination of the emergency can not possibly be based solely upon the affairs of the Military Establishment. Generally speaking, it may be said that the whole pressure of these other interests is for the termination of the emergency at the earliest practicable date. My authority under existing law to hold emergency officers on the work of liquidation would automatically cease from that date and the whole liquidation machinery would be utterly disorganized. The loss that would result is difficult to estimate.

26. Moreover, as has above been stated, many of the emergency officers are men each of whom in civil life is, owing to his special technical or other knowledge, able to earn an income much in excess of that he is receiving as an officer. He is, however, willing to remain in the service provided that he thinks his stay there will last at least until the completion of the work that is known to be on hand. If, however, he knows that the length of his stay will not be so determined but is dependent upon a contingency that may occur any day, he realizes that if he remains in the service he does so in the status of a man engaged subject to discharge at a day's notice.

27. These men were willing in the hour of the Nation's need to give their services without condition. Now that it is merely a question of a pure business proposition of liquidating property and plant, no man can be criticized for desiring that his status in that operation be put on a normal business basis.

28. The national defense act authorized 11,755 officers in the permanent establishment. There are, however, at present about 2,200 vacancies. The number of officers, therefore, actually in the permanent establishment is about 9,500. The effect of this bill, if passed, pending the filling of these vacancies, would be to enable me to retain in the service a total of about 8,500 emergency officers.

29. It follows that in many departments the number of emergency officers will exceed the number of Regular officers. During the war it has been the policy of the heads of all the supply and staff departments to fill each position in his department with the man available to him who is best fitted for it, irrespective of whether that man was a permanent or an emergency officer, and to give that man the rank justified by the responsibilities of the position. That policy is being still pursued and is believed to be that which will make for the greatest efficiency in liquidation work. It thus happens frequently that of two men at desks facing each other and occupying positions of equal responsibilities, and therefore equal rank, one is an emergency and the other a Regular officer of a junior grade holding higher rank temporarily. On this account a specific provision has been included in the bill authorizing me to continue this practice. It is submitted in this connection that it would certainly work many unintended hardships were the bill so amended as to permit us to retain the emergency man with the rank adequate to his responsibilities, but face to face with a man of the Regular service, who, with no diminished responsibilities, was, at the "termination of the emergency," reduced to his former rank.

30. Expenditure involved: The cost to the Government for the eight months will be approximately $12,500,000. Considered as an amount paid to insure competent supervision over the liquidation of property valued at $6,500,000,000, the expenditure is equivalent to obtaining that insurance for eight months at a premium of less than one-fifth of 1 per cent. Moreover, assuming—what is quite beyond the bounds of reason—that the only effect of failure to provide proper supervision will be to prolong unduly the period of liquidation, the cost to the Government for the civilian liquidating force for 20 days of such prolongation would exceed the whole cost until June 30, 1920, of the supervising force now asked for.

31. What is really involved is not the mere question of whether there shall be retained in the service 12,000 officers or 18,000 officers or 20,000 officers. It is whether or not the Nation's sick and wounded shall be properly cared for and the liquidation which involves a money value of $6,500,000,000 and interests and classes of property so many and so varied that it affects practically every line of industry shall be so conducted as to insure the most expeditious and most economical return to the commercial life of the country of an amount greater than was the amount of the national debt as it existed at any date prior to this war.

Sincerely, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

AUGUST 19, 1919.

Memorandum for the director of operations:
Subject: Distribution of the 18,000 officers.

1. The responsible head of each organization of the Military Establishment was called upon to submit an estimate of the minimum number of officers required to function his organization under the abnormal conditions that will obtain during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. The aggregate of these estimates is 24,693.

2. To meet the conditions of the bill, S. 2622, this number has been scaled down to a total of 18,000 officers tentatively distributed by services as follows:

	In service now.	Asked for by department heads.	Allotted.	National defense act.	Additional number required.
General officers	140	90	90	61	38
General Staff	344	239	199	88	111
Adjutant General	420	210	204	50	54
Inspector General	105	112	82	28	54
Judge Advocate General	280	329	234	31	203
Quartermaster Corps	4,607	3,138	1,072 1350	359	1,053
Medical Corps	12,068	932	2,877	1,551	1,326
Dental Corps		392	347	233	104

2. Owing to changing conditions it is not possible to estimate accurately the maximum strain in any one of these organizations. This phase of the situation is also affected by the undeterminable and varying dates when sick and wounded officers, who now number over 1,800, many of whom will require long continuous treatment, will become available for duty. Therefore this distribution among the services can not be made rigid.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to officers of the permanent establishment as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment, and to retain at their temporary grade such officers of the Regular Army as he may deem necessary: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected so far as practicable from officers who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointment in the permanent establishment: Provided further, That after September 30, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers held in active service under this act shall at no time exceed 18,000.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to officers of the permanent establishment as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected, so far as practicable, from officers and enlisted men who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointment in the permanent establishment: Provided further, That after October 30, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers in active service shall at no time exceed 18,000: Provided further, That no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at schools and colleges, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty: And provided further, That 1,200 officers shall be assigned to the Air Service, of whom not less than 85 per cent shall be duly qualified fliers."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question on the——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said he was going to be liberal in allowing us to offer amendments. I have an amendment I want to offer to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair state that it is not proper to move the previous question in the committee.

Mr. LITTLE. Let us not shut off debate on this.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I desire to offer.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to find out just how much time is desired at this time, and how many amendments it is desired to offer.

Mr. BLANTON. I have one amendment that I desire to offer.

Mr. DYER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. As I understand it, amendments are not in order and can not be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, yes; they are in order under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Germane amendments are.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is making an inquiry as to how many amendments are to be offered and how much time is desired for debate.

Mr. KAHN. I understand there are probably five or six amendments to be offered. I would like to finish the bill to-night.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not do that. Finish it in the morning.

Mr. KAHN. I shall not interpose any objection at this time to offering amendments.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Would it be entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from California, if it is to the committee, if, when the previous question is ordered on the bill, we adjourn and have the vote to-morrow?

Mr. KAHN. I certainly will have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state that the previous question is ordered automatically under the rule.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] is recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

So that it will read:

And provided further, That 1,200 emergency officers shall be assigned.

And so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 2, line 21, after the word "officers," insert the word "emergency."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREENE of Vermont: Page 2, line 20, after the word "duty," strike out the colon, insert a semicolon, and the following language:

"And provided further, That hereafter officers retired for physical disability shall not form part of the limited retired list."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, may we not have that amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California reserves a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I have proposed may, on the face of it, seem to be possessed of some technical character that would cause some distrust and suspicion, especially on the part of some of our friends who are rather dubious about voting for this bill at all, because they think it may extend or amplify the powers of the War Department.

The reason for proposing this amendment here and now is simply to take advantage of the text of the bill itself relating to the detail of retired officers, to cure at this time a long-standing complaint against an old statute which is no longer applicable to present circumstances and conditions. Under the old statute the retired list of the Army was divided into two parts, a limited and an unlimited list, and, singularly enough, the most impracticable part of it is that the limited list provided for the retirement of officers only, first, for physical disability, unless found disqualified upon promotion examination; second, by direction of the President upon reaching the age of 62 years; and, third, upon their own application after more than 30 and less than 40 years' service. All other officers when retired were placed on the unlimited list.

You will see that that prevents the elimination from the active officers' list officers incapacitated through physical disability at any time when this limited list is already filled up. They have to be carried on full pay on the active list of the Army, although doing nothing, until there happens to be a vacancy on the limited list, when they can be retired on three-quarters pay. So that it is manifestly in the interest of economy, to say nothing about the improvement of the service, to place these men on the unlimited list.

Now, then, as illustrative of the practical sense behind this amendment and of the actual condition in the Army to-day, I may suggest to you that there are now being carried on the active list of the Army 41 officers who have been found physically incapacitated for duty, and who are now being carried at full pay, but who can not be retired at three-quarters pay until vacancies can be opened up on the so-called limited list.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And your amendment will carry them on the unlimited list?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; so that we may have room for active men on the active list, and at the same time carry out the spirit of our good intentions toward the Army in the matter of economy.

Mr. GARNER. Your amendment is in the interest of economy?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly. It is in the interest of economy as well as the efficiency of the service.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order is pending.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California withdraws the reservation of the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Texas a member of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. BLANTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 2, line 15, after the word "exceed," strike out "18" and insert in lieu thereof "14."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our distinguished colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD, who has seen important active service, is my authority for the statement that in peace times there should be one officer to every 60 men, and that in active war service there should be one officer to every 40 men.

Mr. SHERWOOD. That is what it was during the Civil War.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the gentleman believes it should be now?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. According to Gen. SHERWOOD as authority, with our 225,000 soldiers authorized by law, there should be in peace times only 3,750 officers.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have only five minutes. I am sorry I can not yield.

According to Gen. SHERWOOD, in active war time, with 225,000 soldiers, there should be only 5,625 officers.

But according to this bill we are to authorize the Secretary of War to have 18,000 officers kept in the Military Establishment. As long as war lasted I voted for every measure requested by the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or the President, and if the war were going on at this time I would continue without question to do so; but on November 11, 1918, the armistice was signed, and fighting ceased, and from that day up to this, and all through my future career in Congress, when matters are submitted to this House respecting the business of this Nation, I am going to follow my own best judgment so far as my vote is concerned on every issue that is presented to this House, and not simply the request of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy. [Applause]. I am constrained to believe that the person in the back part of the House making so much noise and who is trying to interfere with the debate is not a Member of the House, but he must be a new page or somebody who is not familiar with the rules, hence I will not say anything further about it. But if, according to Gen. SHERWOOD, 3,750 officers are sufficient in peace times, and 5,625 officers are sufficient in war time to handle the American Army of 225,000 men, then in God's name if we give them 10,000 more, according to my amendment, making 14,000 officers for our 225,000 men, why are not they enough to handle the situation?

They say that we need doctors. If you will read the report on this bill you will see that they say we will have in round numbers about 30,000 men who are sick and afflicted with injuries, and they are asking in round numbers about 3,000 surgeons or one surgeon to every 10 men. Now, as time passes we can expect Mother Nature to assist these surgeons to help the men get well and be repaired and get out of the hospitals, but you do not take the surgeons out except by order of this Congress. These 3,000 surgeons will continue in the service until June, 1920, even though all sick and disabled men should be discharged from the hospitals by November 1. But because the Military Establishment has asked for 18,000 officers, forsooth, we must shut our eyes and vote for it.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am sorry, indeed, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has such a poor opinion of the Secretary of War. The Secretary of War has said that he needs about 18,000 officers, not to command men in the field or in the camps, but to take care of the business incident to the end of the war—the finishing-up process. Anyhow this bill is not a command to the Secretary of War to keep 18,000 officers on the pay roll, but it says that until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to officers of the permanent establishment as in his judgment may be necessary, and so on. Now, I know the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has no confidence in the present administration——

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I have. The gentleman must not misquote me in that way.

Mr. KEARNS. The gentleman did not believe the present administration when it said the other day that it would need 18,000 officers. I do not know whether they need 18,000 officers or not. I know that the Secretary of War, who in this instance is the mouthpiece of the President of the United States, says he will need that many. As I said before, these are not officers in command of troops. They are not really officers at all. They are simply men brought out of civil life, camouflaged in officers' uniforms. The War Department claims that they will need possibly 2,700 of these men to take care of the sick and wounded who are now in beds in hospitals throughout the United States. The Secretary of War has said, in addition to that, that he will need these physicians—you may call them officers if you please—to take care of the men who will be sick among the 250,000 in the Regular Army. Many of those men will be sick between now and the 30th of June.

And I would like again to impress upon the membership of this House that this is only a temporary bill. It only continues these men in office until June 30, 1920.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEARNS. Yes; if the gentleman will make it brief.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am going to vote for the bill, but I want to be clear on two points. Will this bill have a tendency in any way to prolong the stay of the private soldiers in Europe?

Mr. KEARNS. I am glad that question has been asked. It has nothing to do with the soldiers in Europe; and the reason why this House passed the appropriation bill in the form in which it did pass it was to compel demobilization and bring back the boys from France, to get them home, where they ought to be. In doing that we robbed the War Department of a certain officer personnel which it will need in order to clear up the tail end of the business incident to this war.

Now, there is another reason why they will need these officers.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. A second question along the same line.

Mr. KEARNS. I can not yield any further. They will need additional officers to help take care of and get ready for sale $6,500,000,000 worth of property. It has been estimated that these men will each one have in charge a million dollars' worth of property. I mean those officers assigned to that business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks that his time be extended for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I must object.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I will ask if the vote on the amendment we have before the House does not come first.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas is an amendment to the amendment in the bill.

So that the amendment to strike out the last word is an amendment in the third degree. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 8, noes 93.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The question of ordering tellers was taken, and seven Members rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, we might as well be frank about this. It may be that you will pass the bill to add 6,000 officers to the Army without adding one soldier, but if you do you will do so without any reason whatever being advanced for its passage. They say that they need 3,000 doctors. I call attention to the fact that that would be 1 doctor for every 10 men.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LITTLE. No; I will not yield; I have only five minutes and other gentlemen would not yield to me. The figures fix it at 29,000 sick to be treated this year and the doctors at 2,900, and that is a doctor for every 10 sick people. Every man here knows that any statement that they need such a number of doctors for such a number of sick is pure nonsense. If any man votes to give 2,900 doctors to 29,000 sick men, he is voting away the money of the public without any return whatever. [Applause.]

Nobody has tried to answer my suggestion on that last proposition. There is no pretense here that any fighting force is increased or that anybody is asked to be added who will go into the fight.

When I said that there was no increase of Cavalry, no increase of Infantry, no increase of Artillery, I said there is nobody to be added that will fight. The answer was, "Oh, yes; doctors have died on the battle field." Yes, doctors and nurses have died on the battle field, men and women both, but they are not combatant forces, and when a doctor goes in he does not expect to be put on the battle front. I said that nobody was to be added who was expected to fight, and that has not been denied. Yet they seek to add an expense of $15,000,000, and not one more fighting man in the Army.

They then say that they want to take care of the business of the Army. Gentlemen, if you have a lot of property to take care of, you had better hire some civilian business man to take care of it and save it. These men are trained at West Point, and they have no business experience whatever. Their idea of Ford car conservation in France is to pile them up and burn them.

When Gen. Siebert went to France the newspapers said he took charge of the Manila & Dagupan Railroad in the Philippines in 1898 and started it. He did not do anything of the kind. No officer in the Army nor any graduate of West Point was on hand to take charge. No Army engineer took charge. A private soldier by the name of John Haisch took charge of the railroad. He ran it from Manila until we got hold of the whole length of it and long after. I know something about it, because he was my own orderly, and he ran it for months as a private soldier. There was no officer from West Point on his force. You go to the Library and get the record of that war, and you read the dispatches, and you will see that they are signed "Haisch," and the orders from Maj. Gen. Otis are to John Haisch. He could tell a major general when to get on and when to get off. These Army-trained engineers were not found when McArthur's Division took the railroad from Manila to Dagupan. A volunteer soldier from the Twentieth Kansas took charge, put the railroad in motion, and was more useful to our forces in the Philippines than any man who ever saw West Point. This war was fought by men trained a few weeks or months. The business of this country is not managed by graduates of the Military Academy. If you want the Army run so as to save money, get a business man to run it, and he will not burn the property over there in France. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 15, after the word "exceed," strike out the word "eighteen" and insert the word "fifteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were 16 ayes and 87 noes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman demands tellers. All in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Three gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOCH: Page 2, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "and are applicants for appointments in the permanent establishment."

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, possibly I do not understand the purpose of this clause, but I offer the amendment believing that it should prevail, provided my understanding is correct. If not, I shall stand corrected. I understand this is merely a temporary arrangement to provide officers until the 30th of June next year. If that be true, it seems that we have discriminated here, in granting these commissions, against the boys who are now in the service and who may desire to remain until the 30th of June, but who do not desire a permanent appointment in the Military Establishment. With reference to the first provision, that we should give a preference to those who have seen service, certainly we all agree to that, that those who have seen service in the war should be given preference; but if this is not a move for a permanent policy, why should we discriminate and say that we will, as far as practicable, turn down those who may now be in the service, but who may desire a commission up until the 30th of June, and will prefer those who desire to be professional soldiers?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is exactly what we are trying to do. We are trying to take in only such men as desire to stay in the Army, so that the men who desire to be released may be released immediately. There are 18,000 applications on file now, and these 6,000 will be selected from the 18,000 applicants.

Mr. HOCH. I do not think the gentleman understands my position. Why should we discriminate against the soldier who does not desire to be a soldier permanently, but who desires simply to remain until the 30th of June next? This bill provides that we shall make the appointments not from those who simply want to stay until the 30th of June, but from those who want to enter the Regular Establishment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Because common sense dictates that a man who has his application on file to enter the permanent establishment should be taken in, while others who are going to get out anyway, who just desire to stay for a few months, might as well get out now.

Mr. HOCH. It says that they shall be chosen from officers and enlisted men. If there is an enlisted man who is entitled to a commission by virtue of distinguished service, even though it be only until the 30th day of June next, why should he not be given that commission and the pay that goes with that commission? Why should we say that we prefer the man who desires to become a professional soldier?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOCH. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. The reference to enlisted men in the bill is this: There are many enlisted men who during the war have been given commissions. They are now in the commissioned personnel. They are among the 14,000 additional emergency officers who are going to be demobilized. The purpose of that is to allow them to keep these enlisted men in the commissioned personnel. It is the purpose to hold them. Otherwise they would have to be sent back to the enlisted force.

Mr. HOCH. Does not this provide that one who is an enlisted man, who does not hold a commission, but who may desire, if he can get a commission, to stay until the 30th of June, shall not be chosen? I would like to have that man given preference. Why should we not give it to that man instead of saying to him we prefer the man who is going to enter the regular standing Army? I want no discrimination against any soldier who has rendered service in this war, and who is otherwise worthy, merely because he does not choose to join the Army permanently and become a professional soldier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I will find some time later to explain to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PLATT: Page 2, line 15, after the word "exceed" strike out "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof "nineteen."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the amendment. I offer this amendment because I think the temper of this House is altogether too narrow in regard to the War Department's requirements, very much as it was before the war, when the Democrats were in the majority. We all know now that the failure to comply with recommendations of the department then cost many millions of dollars later. The men in the War Department are not seeking to discredit the administration of which the Secretary of War is a part by advocating unnecessary expense. They are in a position to know what is needed, and there is no reason why we should be so narrow and cheeseparing about the whole thing. They have estimated for about 24,000 officers for the clearing-up and readjustment period. At the demand of the committee they have pared it down to a bare 18,000. Now, I offer this amendment in a spirit of cooperation with the needs of the department, and also for the purpose of asking this question of the chairman of the committee: Some remarks, more or less facetious, have been made about the number of medical men in the Army. Now, it has been said by physicians in civil life in high station and by many health officers that there is great danger of a return of the epidemic of influenza this fall. I desire to ask if the Army has made any preparation for its soldiers, who may be taken with the influenza this fall, in the way of retaining physicians and nurses in the service and maintaining hospitals in readiness for such a serious emergency?

Mr. DYER. They go to the Public Health Service.

Mr. PLATT. Soldiers go to the Public Health Service?

Mr. DYER. Yes; those discharged.

Mr. PLATT. I am not talking about discharged soldiers.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield gladly to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. KAHN. So far as I understand the Medical Service of the War Department has said nothing to the Committee on Military Affairs about the possibility of an epidemic of influenza. But the gentleman is quite right. There may be such an epidemic. And yet I do not agree with him that it is necessary to increase the number of officers to 19,000.

Mr. PLATT. You need two or three thousand more medical officers to take care of the Army alone in case there should be such an epidemic.

Mr. KAHN. Then we will have to get them at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky has asked me to yield to him for the purpose of asking a question. I desire to be courteous in the matter.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect for the opinion of the chairman of the committee and I want to know from the chairman if we vote for this additional officers' bill has it any bearing on the retention of the private soldier in Germany?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it will have any on the private soldier anywhere. I am entirely in accord with the gentleman in wanting our forces brought home and demobilized. I want to say to the gentleman, as I stated before, the War Department has already demobilized 190,000 emergency soldiers. And replaced them with civilians who are now working in the War Department. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. TINCHER. As I understand the bill now preference is given in the appointment of about 18,000 extra officers to those who are applying for commissions in the permanent army?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Now, then, if this bill becomes a law and those commissions are given, does the gentleman mean to say that it is not contemplated that there will be 18,000 permanent officers in the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. TINCHER. What will they do, reduce them?

Mr. KAHN. Of course they will be materially reduced when the Army reorganization bill is brought in, but at the very latest this number can be retained only until June 30, 1920.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not believe that the gentleman got my point, or I did not make myself clear. But what I mean is this: Does the gentleman mean that the officer himself—take a captain or a major——

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Will be reduced in rank after next June, because he is to be appointed from the men who apply for a permanent position in the Army?

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, if I can make myself clear, and if I can have the attention of the gentleman, many officers in the Regular Army are being demoted now. They held this high rank because we had 186,000 officers for our war-time Army. As the Army is being reduced to a peace-time basis these Regular Army officers are being reduced in rank accordingly. And, of course, some of these emergency officers will be held in higher station than others, but the work of demotion for the Regular Army officers will go on right along.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MADDEN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 2622) to provide the necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—CALIFORNIA RAILROAD STRIKE.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by the publication of four telegrams that I have received in regard to the strike situation in southern California. I would like to have the House informed as to the situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the four telegrams to which he has referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the telegrams referred to:

As a result of tie-up on administration lines in California, 25 oil refineries, 20 of which are solely dependent on rail transportation for their crudes, are to-day practicaly isolated from their source of supply as well as customers.

Irrigation systems, power plants, public utilities, power, gas, and water plants in outlying districts, dependent on fuel oil, are shut off.

Food supplies dependent on truck transportation, in turn dependent on gasoline distillate and lubricants from refineries, may soon cease to move.

Locally oil marketers have situation fairly in hand, but stocks in country are dwindling fast, in spite of our efforts with hundreds of trucks on 24-hour service to relieve situation.

Immediate action on part of Railroad Administration is urged to meet an already serious condition.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 27, 1919.

Hon. H. Z. OSBORNE, Washington, D. C.:

In view of alleged reason given by steam railroad employees for tying up steam railroad traffic west of Ogden, Albuquerque, and El Paso, and with particular reference to press dispatch dated Cleveland, August 23, quoting statement of railroad brotherhood chiefs, the following statement of situation as to strike on Pacific Electric Railway and Los Angeles Railway may be of service:

Pacific Electric Railway had at no time any strike or threatened strike on its lines from 1900 until 1918, when steam railroad organizers solicited its men for membership, the company, under the President's War Labor Board proclamation of April, 1918, no longer opposing membership in such organizations.

It was represented to employees that they were entitled to steam-railroad rates of pay and working conditions. Under direction of brotherhood officers, having no employment with Pacific Electric Railway, strike was called July 2, 1918, on six hours' notice, alternative being recognition of steam-line brotherhood's negotiations with their officers on behalf of Pacific Electric Railway and under conditions as then known and subsequently proved impossible for the Pacific Electric Railway to meet. Strike was in face of Pacific Electric Railway's service being essential in connection with navy base, Army post, aviation camps, and munitions industries. Federal injunction and prompt action of Navy Department, together with reluctance of employees to strike in these circumstances, resulted in all men returning to work within a few hours after they struck.

The same brotherhood officers then appealed to War Labor Board, setting forth certain claims on steam-line basis. Case dragged; was amended in December, certain Pacific Electric Railway employees then appearing. War Labor Board took full testimony nearly six weeks in hearing, resulting in decision of April 9, 1919, showing contention of brotherhood chiefs that this property should be classed with steam lines totally disregarded.

Wage schedules were recommended for men involved, they being entirely in transportation department, at rates of pay which were actually less on the whole than those in effect before strike of 10 days ago, advances having been made voluntarily subsequent to War Labor Board decision.

Brotherhood officers made vigorous attempt to secure rehearing before War Labor Board, but no action was taken. They did not indicate they would abide by its decision, though they were the ones who had appealed to it. While the company offered full testimony, it reserved the right as to whether or not it would adopt the decision. Effort was then made by brotherhood men in employ of company working in association with steam-line brotherhood officers to create general dissatisfaction on Pacific Electric Railway and secure general walkout, with result that on August 16 committee claiming to represent large majority of employees called on vice president at 10 o'clock in morning, presented an ultimatum in the way of wage and working conditions, which they required him to adopt by 1 o'clock, or else they would call general strike at 2 o'clock following morning.

These schedules meant addition to pay rolls of $2,500,000 and could not be entertained, the company having operated at a deficit after deduction of fixed charges of $1,690,000 in 1918, and adoption of proposed schedules would make it impossible to secure operating revenues sufficient to meet operating expenses and taxes without any allowance for taxes and fixed charges.

Wages of men have been increased up to August 1, 60 per cent in two years. Compared with wages elsewhere for like work, under like conditions of living, they are much higher as a rule.

Distribution of total number of men, motormen and conductors, on July 31 in service of company was, in street car service, 602; interurban passenger service, 646; freight switching, work train, and other service, 248 men. Many of these latter engaged on single car movements. Over 70 per cent of revenue is derived from street car and interurban fares, averaging about 10 cents each, and during seven months ending July 31 only 21.5 per cent was derived from freight traffic, and year's average revenue derived from freight traffic interchanged with steam lines is only about 8 per cent.

It is manifestly absurd that on such an interurban and street car system there should be such persistent attempts to fasten steam railroad wages and conditions under which company could not possibly operate, and it is not understood how Brotherhood chiefs can in their minds classify motormen of street cars with their locomotive engineers.

Pacific Electric Railway operates and connects parts of four counties in southern California, linking the cities with interurban service, and provides street car service in 10 cities and towns.

Los Angeles Railway, on which strike was called at same time, gives only a street car service in city of Los Angeles, is narrow-gauge line, and has no connection with steam lines whatever.

Strike on electric lines was failure, though without warning to railways, and Pacific Railway had not hired one man in anticipation of strike. Of its employees, however, less than 35 per cent followed the strike leaders, and on Los Angeles Railway less than 30 per cent struck. Within a few days our daylight service was adequate on both electric railways and is now practically normal.

Pacific Electric Railway is in this territory and through Los Angeles Harbor, handling United States mail in all directions heretofore carried by steam lines, and at request of Federal managers has brought large numbers of passengers from Colton, San Bernardino, where steam-line crews deserted the trains.

In beginning of strike steam-line crews, in violation of their contract with steam lines and Director General as successor thereto, and in violation of their strike instructions as promulgated before the Federal court in July, 1918, in effort to keep injunction from being made permanent, which injunction was made permanent and sustained by United States District (Circuit) Court of Appeals, refused to perform service they had previously performed in switching cars to and from Pacific Electric tracks. They were not disciplined for this action, and United States Railroad Administration followed a policy of conservative conciliation.

This action had not any effect upon Pacific Electric Railway and Los Angeles Railway situation. They proceeded then to stop work first in southern California, then throughout the territory west of Ogden, Albuquerque, and El Paso to demonstrate their power and in effort to intimidate the administration into coercing the Pacific Electric Railway and Los Angeles Railway to accept conditions under which it would be impossible to operate the properties.

The result has been to arouse an antagonism almost beyond measure throughout California against their action, as illustrated by telegraphic resolutions and expression of views to the President, Director General, and Director of Transportation, United States Railroad Administration, from scores of chambers of commerce and commercial bodies and hundreds of companies and individuals as stated in the press here.

Pacific Electric Railway does not refuse to discuss any questions with its men, but, on the contrary, its officers meet with them monthly on all divisions and invite full and free discussion of all grievances, and these grievances are considered with committees where employees so desire, the individual rights being reserved, however, where men wish to speak for themselves. The company with the employees maintains a club of 2,000 members and summer camp in the mountains, gives them 12 days' vacation with pay with transportation each year; provides recreation rooms at terminals and hospital system. No employee can be discharged without full hearing with employee of his own election to represent him if he does not wish to represent himself. Has right to appeal to President, and thereafter, if he so desires, he can go outside and have his case decided by commissioner appointed by Federal judges of southern California.

All employees, five years' service and over, receive annual passes for themselves and family. Minimum wage guaranteed to every motorman and conductor after he enters service, $100 per month. Students paid while breaking in. Wages on regular runs averaged in July: Street car service, from $140 to $145; interurban passenger service, $150 to $158; freight service, from $170 to $185. A considerable number of employees in such service earn over $200 per month.

I place these statements before you in refutation of charges made in interview referred to, and repeat that until officers of the brotherhoods under what must have been a mistaken idea as to nature of our operations solicited memberships among our employees with promises that were impossible of fulfillment, there was never a strike on the Pacific Electric Railway. All increases in wages have been made voluntarily on the part of the company, and wages and other questions have been subject of full and free discussion between officers and employees.

PAUL SHOUP,
President Pacific Electric Railway Co.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 21, 1919.

Hon. H. Z. OSBORNE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

The following resolution was this day unanimously adopted by the undersigned organizations assembled in joint meeting:

Whereas strike conditions now existing in the city of Los Angeles gravely imperil the very life of our community through the action of a few who, in the assertion of their demands, by their actions are causing the loss and destruction and preventing the necessary transportation of foodstuffs, thereby threatening want and suffering upon the great majority of the people of this community who are not connected directly or indirectly with their controversy and are seeking by such means to compel the great majority of people forced by such suffering and privation to become their allies in accomplishing their purposes; and

Whereas the declared purpose of those who are now striking and of their leaders is to deal a death blow at the principles of the open shop and industrial freedom, which are the vital principles upon which this community has been built, lived, and prospered; and

Whereas the loyal men who are now exercising their constitutional right as American freemen to labor are encountering the wrath and opposition of and are carrying the brunt of the battle with those who are seeking to destroy free labor; and

Whereas the citizens of Los Angeles desire to express their intention of supporting and protecting those who are working and making the fight and of encouraging the independent workmen, who constitute the great majority of workers, in asserting and insisting upon their right to labor as free men without themselves or others being coerced by illegal means: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the undersigned organizations, instituted and existing for the purpose of fostering, developing, and protecting the welfare of this community, call a meeting of their members for the purpose of voicing the foregoing sentiments, to the end that a united American citizenship, with their families, in this crisis may make a successful resistance against this peril and at whatever necessary sacrifice settle the proposition that Los Angeles is a free city and that the foregoing principles must be preserved and maintained in all their integrity to insure the happiness and contentment of our people.

Bolshevism can not and will not be allowed, through the courage of our people, to rear its malignant head or to leave its withering curse and devastated path in our community: Be it further

Resolved, That we pledge our cooperation and support, physical, moral, and financial, to the President and United States Railroad Administration in all efforts necessary to restore a vital service necessary to both the Nation and community, which has been temporarily destroyed by strikers acting in violation of their contracts and their obligations to their country.

Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, Los Angeles Realty Board, Kiwanis Club, Rotary Club, Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, Southern California Laundry Owners' Association, Commercial Federation of California, Southern California Wholesale Grocers' Association, Founders and Employers' Association, Southern California Hotel Men's Association, Los Angeles Clearing House, Wholesalers' Board of Trade, Los Angeles Grain Exchange, Building Owners' Association of Los Angeles, Building Industries Association, Produce Exchange of Los Angeles, Wholesale Drygoods Association of Los Angeles, Retail Drygoods Merchants' Association, Wholesale Metal Dealers' Association, Motor Car Dealers' Association, Southern California Seed Trade Association.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DRANE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, for two days, on account of important business.

EXPENSES OF PEACE COMMISSION (S. DOC. NO. 80).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

At the close of the last session of Congress, after it had become certain that the peace conference at Paris would not be able to conclude its work until after the expiration of the fiscal year, on June 30, 1919, when the existing appropriations from which the expenses of the American commission were being paid would cease to be available, the Acting Secretary of State submitted, at my direction, a request for an additional appropriation of $5,000,000. The amount was requested, first, in order to defray the expenses of the American participation in the conference at Paris until the close of its deliberations; and second, to meet the initial expenses of the American participation in the various commissions and agencies which the treaty with Germany provides shall be set up immediately after the ratification of that treaty.

No action having been taken on that request by Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, at my direction, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, in June last, pointed out the urgency of providing for the expenses of the American commission, and this was followed by a communication from the Acting Secretary of State further explaining the necessity of the appropriation. No steps have yet been taken to provide for the expenses of the American delegation in Paris or of the agencies necessary to the discharge of its duties since July 1, 1919, when the appropriation for the national security and defense ceased to be available. It is, therefore, incumbent upon me again to bring the matter to your attention and point out the urgency of making suitable appropriations for the expenses of the commission. Meanwhile I have been compelled to make use of part of the emergency fund of the Department of State for the expenses of the commission, which is unfortunate in view of the large demand which it is foreseen will be made upon that fund during the current fiscal year.

Inasmuch as there might be objection to providing money at this time for the execution of any of the provisions of the treaty, when ratified, it is not desired now to ask your attention to that part of the estimate submitted.

I assume that no explanation is necessary of the continued presence of the commission in Paris, since everyone knows that although the treaty with Germany is now before the Senate, treaties with Austria, Turkey, and Bulgaria are yet to be completed, and many other matters of actual and potential concern to this country require careful attention of the American representatives.

The purposes for which an additional appropriation is needed will be indicated by the inclosed statement of the expenditures already made and the liabilities growing out of the peace conference. In considering these expenses and estimates, it should be borne in mind that for a time the personnel of the American delegation numbered more than 1,300 persons, and on July 31 last had been reduced to about 400, about 88 of whom were civilians, the remainder being from the Army and Navy. The conference has been held at a time when conditions in France are abnormal, prices of food being more than 120 per cent greater than a year ago; railroad transportation having increased more than 150 per cent; fuel not only difficult to obtain but only obtainable at prices over 200 per cent higher than before the war. Although an Army commissary has been utilized for the most part, the prices paid have, notwithstanding, been vastly greater than in prewar times. Then, too, means of communication and the usual channels of information have been so greatly impaired, as a result of the war, that not only has it been necessary to maintain an expensive courier system but, in many instances, commissions have had to be dispatched for purposes of investigation in order that the American Commission might be in a position to act intelligently and upon information the accuracy of which had been positively established. These unusual conditions have made the work of the commission expensive, although I have no hesitation in saying that considering the magnitude of the task and the extent to which the commission was obliged to rely upon its own agencies, instead of upon those available in normal times, the expenses have been and are very modest.

It is obviously not possible at present to estimate how much longer the conference may be in session, but assuming that its work shall extend to the end of the calendar year, December 31, 1919, which I think may be regarded as the maximum, the sum of $825,000 will be required for the expenses. I hope that this amount may be appropriated at an early date.

WOODROW WILSON.

(Inclosures:—Statement as described above.)

THE WHITE HOUSE.
28 August, 1919.

LEAVE TO FILE MINORITY REPORT.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] be allowed five days in which to file a minority report on House joint resolution No. 151.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] be allowed five days in which to file a minority report on House joint resolution No. 151. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CANNON. What for?

Mr. MONDELL. For the purpose of having the vote on this bill and putting in a good day on legislation that will come before the House, probably from the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MONDELL. I do not care to insist, Mr. Speaker, if there is any general objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask if there will be included in the legislation to-morrow any relief for the private soldier?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not——

Mr. BLANTON. If not, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, August 29, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting list of useless papers in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, and asking for disposition thereof, was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on Reform in Civil Service, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7404) to repeal section 7 of the act of October 7, 1917, entitled "An act making appropriation to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 272), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2945) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Minidoka, Idaho, for railroad purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 273), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEENERSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 151) to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service where extraordinary and unusual conditions prevail, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 274), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from California [Mr JOHNSON], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] are absent on official business as members of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. KING answered to his name when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call.

Mr. THOMAS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. WATSON, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. ELKINS, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. KEYES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained on business of the committees of the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KNOX obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

JOHN D. RYAN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in the Washington Post of this morning there is a telegraphic dispatch from Portland, Oreg., entitled:

Charge $5,000,000 wasted on spruce. May find basis for recovery against Ryan, add probers.

The article justifies the headline. I will not take time to read it.

My purpose in calling the attention of the Senate to it is that the charge of misconduct is again insinuated against Mr. John D. Ryan, recently Assistant Secretary of War and Director of Aviation Production. I have little doubt but that this committee will discover a wastage of large sums of money in the production of spruce; but these insinuations against an upright, honest, and patriotic citizen are so wholly unwarranted, so cruelly unjust, especially when repeated, that I feel justified in asking unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a letter dated the 16th of August from Gen. Brice P. Disque, late brigadier general, United States Army, commanding the spruce division, citing the connection of Mr. Ryan with this affair, to which I think the public is entitled, in view of the repeated innuendo which reflects upon Mr. Ryan's standing and character as a citizen and a public official.

I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The Washington Post, Aug. 29, 1919.]

"CHARGE $5,000,000 WASTED ON SPRUCE—MAY FIND BASIS FOR RECOVERY AGAINST RYAN, ADD PROBERS.

"PORTLAND, OREG., August 28.

"Charges that approximately $5,000,000 of Government funds had been 'squandered, misapplied, and converted to the prospective uses of the Milwaukee railroad interests,' were contained in a report telegraphed to-day to Secretary of War Baker by the congressional committee investigating operation of the Spruce Production Division.

"The report declares that the expenditures of the spruce production division were 'wasteful and unnecessary.' It concludes by saying that 'further investigation may disclose conditions upon which a recovery can be had against John D. Ryan and others who are responsible for this wasteful expenditure of public funds.'

"The report was signed by Representative JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, chairman, and WALTER W. MAGEE, of New York. Representative CLARENCE F. LEA, Democratic member of the committee, did not sign the report."

AUGUST 16, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The prompt manner in which you recently defended Mr. John D. Ryan after his action as Director of Aircraft Production had been misrepresented and attacked leads me to feel that you may be interested in a complete and authoritative statement of the circumstances which led to the construction of a railway line in Clallam County, State of Washington.

I was in charge of spruce-production activities from November, 1917, until the end of the war and personally handled all problems which led to construction activities connected therewith.

It was some time in February, 1918, that I decided that it would be necessary to have a railway finished and ready for operations not later than January, 1919, with a view to obtaining spruce from the Clallam County timber tract. The Milwaukee Railroad approached that stand of timber nearer than any other line, and, with a view to conserving the funds of the War Department, I carried on negotiations with the officials of the Milwaukee road, Mr. H. B. Earling, vice president, and subsequently Mr. H. E. Byrom, president of the road.

It seemed to me then, and still does, that the logical thing was to have the Milwaukee either build the extension themselves or buy it from us later on if we had to build it, because it was an extension of their own line which had been contemplated, and upon which they had been working for several years, advancing 2 or 3 miles each year as the country developed. I endeavored, first, to have the railroad authorities build the line themselves, but they demurred, stating that there was no justification from the railroad standpoint for the expenditure at that time. I then endeavored to come to an agreement with them whereby the railroad might be built by the War Department under a contract with the Milwaukee which would provide for the taking over of the extension upon terms which would be satisfactory to both parties, and allowing for depreciation and interest charges for a period of years which would elapse before the Milwaukee would have made the extension of their own accord.

Our negotiations were progressing satisfactorily when the Railroad Administration took greater control and it became necessary for me to go to Washington in order to expedite the construction of this line, which had to be completed before November of the same year, because of the heavy rainfall in that section rendering construction impossible after that date. It was about this time, May, 1918, that Mr. Ryan was appointed Director of Aircraft Production. Until he was appointed I had never heard of him that I recall, certainly had never seen or spoken to him, nor had he ever heard of me, I am sure.

I went to Washington shortly after Mr. Ryan's appointment, determined to have this railway and several other important matters in our operations decided promptly or to request my release from duties in connection with spruce production, because I had felt that the difficulty and delay in obtaining authority from Washington were seriously prejudicing the effective results of our operations. I had made up my mind that unless Mr. Ryan was a man who would act, and who also had authority commensurate with his responsibility, that I could not continue on an operation which seemed certain of failure, due to delays in Washington.

I met Mr. Ryan for the first time in my life on the day I arrived in Washington and had a long conference with him, outlining the activities of the spruce division. When I referred to the extension of the Milwaukee Railroad, Mr. Ryan promptly told me that he was a director of that line and would not discuss any matters pertaining to it. He asked Mr. Stettinius, Assistant Secretary of War, to act for him in every phase of the matter of extending the Milwaukee road, and from that moment on this subject was never mentioned or discussed with Mr. Ryan.

Mr. Stettinius referred myself and Mr. Byrom, president of the Milwaukee, who had come to Washington to meet me, with a view to carrying on our negotiations, to the Railway Administration for a solution to our problem. Mr. Byrom and I had three conferences with Judge Lovett, who finally stated that the Railway Administration would not permit the Milwaukee to make the extension, nor would they permit the Milwaukee to enter into any contract which would obligate them in any way in connection therewith.

Mr. Byrom then left Washington, and we abandoned the idea of having the Milwaukee Railroad participate in any manner with this branch line which we required.

It then became necessary for us to utilize aircraft funds for the construction of the line, and I explained the project to the Aircraft Board, at which meeting Mr. Ryan absented himself because of his interest in the Milwaukee road, and the possibility that this extension might some day be of interest to that line. The Aircraft Board approved of the project and directed me to proceed with the railroad at our own expense.

Between February and the time referred to in the preceding paragraph I had received numerous requests from contractors, both real and spurious, to give them contracts for building the road, and, after surveying the entire field, we came to the conclusion that the Siems, Carey-H. S. Kerbaugh Corporation were the best prepared to carry out the project.

I had never seen or heard of any of the members of this firm prior to the time they applied for the contract, and my decision to award it to them was based solely upon my conviction that they were more capable of accomplishing our work within the time available than any other contractors who had been considered. And the fact that they actually did complete the 38 miles of line in less than five months, whereas practical railroad men and logging railroad operators had told me it could not be done in a year, has amply justified my decision.

I know positively that Mr. Ryan had absolutely nothing to do with the negotiations leading up to the Siems-Carey contract. I carried them on myself, had a complete contract with them before I left Portland, requiring only the approval of the Director of Aircraft Production to make it legal, and brought it with me to Washington on the trip above mentioned. When I presented this contract to Mr. Ryan he again stated that his interests in the Milwaukee were such that he could not consider it and referred it to Mr. Stettinius, who revised the contract in some minor details, with the assistance of the counsel of the Aircraft Production Board, and submitted the same to the Secretary of War and obtained his approval.

The contract throughout was a fair one to the contractor and the Government, and were I to repeat the operation I would not hesitate to duplicate the contract as it was written and give it to the same contractors.

You will see from the above that the charge that Mr. Ryan influenced our operations in Clallam County or had anything to do with the contract for building of the railroad up there are without the slightest foundation of fact, and I can assure you that your defense of Mr. Ryan in this matter was not only justified but was a duty to a most patriotic gentleman, who gave his tremendous ability to the Government when it was most needed in a most unselfish and disinterested manner.

If there is any phase of this activity or any others connected with the spruce-production division on which you desire information, I shall be only too glad to send it to you in detail.

Very respectfully, yours,

BRICE P. DISQUE,
Late Brigadier General, United States Army, Commanding Spruce Division.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1362) to authorize Hiram I. Sage, a citizen of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Perdido River at or near Nunez Ferry.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 6808. An act to incorporate the American Legion; and

H. R. 7594. An act relating to the creation of the office of general of the Armies of the United States.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the appointment of a joint committee of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives to make arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 6808. An act to incorporate the American Legion was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H. R. 7594. An act relating to the creation of the office of general of the Armies of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, before proceeding with my remarks I ask the privilege of having inserted in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, an index of the German peace treaty which I had prepared for my own use by Maj. J. Ruben Clark, jr., formerly Solicitor of the Department of State, a man who by reason of his great ability and experience in international and diplomatic affairs and fine analytical mind brought to that work, I think, as high a degree of talent as has yet been devoted to it.

I had furnished this document to the Committee on Foreign Relations, realizing its value, and the committee had it printed for the committee's own use; but I think every Senator ought to have the opportunity of inspecting it, because it contains an excellent index of the treaty; it contains a complete coordination of its parts, and a very thorough system of cross references enables one to get at particular subjects that are dealt with in half a dozen or more places in the treaty. So I ask the privilege of having it inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at that point?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. From the Senator's description of this document, I think it ought to be printed in the form of a Senate document. It would be cumbersome for use if it were merely printed in the RECORD, and, as the Senator has described it, I think it ought to be printed by itself. I wish the Senator would include in his request that it also be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. KNOX. I do not know whether or not it is still in type; it is printed now in this form [exhibiting] as a separate document; it is printed in rather larger type than our Senate documents, because there are so many parallel columns of cross references.

Mr. NORRIS. If it were printed in that form, it would be much more valuable to Senators who desire to use it for reference than it would be if it were merely printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. KNOX. I think the Senator from Nebraska is correct, and, yielding to his suggestion, I make the request that the document may be printed as a public document in the form that it is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I wish at the outset to make my own position perfectly clear, that reason or excuse for misunderstanding or misinterpretation may not exist. No one more abhors Germany's lawlessness, her cruelty, her gross inhumanity in the conduct of this war than do I. No one is more determined than I to make her pay the full penalty for the great wrongs she has inflicted on civilization and on the world whose equipoise she has by her iniquities well-nigh destroyed. It must not seem to be profitable for anyone to violate the great eternal laws of right, and we must vindicate them now against Germany if we are to save ourselves from chaos. The observations I shall make are therefore dictated by no maudlin sympathy for Germany, the felon who must suffer the penalty incident to his crime.

But I am vitally concerned in the peace of this world, and peace we must have if it be attainable. But, Mr. President, I am convinced after the most painstaking consideration that I can give, that this treaty does not spell peace but war—war more woeful and devastating than the one we have but now closed. The instrument before us is not the treaty but the truce of Versailles. It is for this body—the coordinate treaty-making power of this great neutral Nation of ours—to make of the document a peace treaty if possible, or if that be impossible, then we must put this Nation in such relation to the treaty and to the powers of the world that our voice may hereafter as heretofore be always raised for peace.

It is to be regretted that the whole matter has been so unfortunately managed, that there has been so much of needless secrecy, so many times mere partial disclosure when the whole truth could and should have been told, so much of assumed mystery in the whole affair, that it has become impossible for any of us not in the confidences to tell when we have arrived at the whole of any matter. It is no fault of mine if the facts themselves shall speak an impeachment of the wisdom, the purpose, or the result of the negotiations.

Fortunately it is no longer necessary to insist upon the high importance of this treaty nor the fact that it marks the point in our history where we turn from our old course of proved happiness, prosperity, and safety to a new one, for us yet untried, of alliances, balance of power, and coalition with countries and peoples whose interests, aspirations, and ideals are foreign to our own, because the people are waking to this as the true issue. Little by little they are bringing a divulgence of the facts connected with the treaty and they may now hope finally to see the whole of the great gaunt tragedy into which those whom they had charged with protecting them were about to betray them.

But as this treaty itself, as finally placed before us, is so intricate and all-embracing in its conception, is so ponderous and voluminous in its execution, is so microscopic in detail, and, because of these things, so inaccessible to the people upon whose backs it is proposed to place its mighty burdens, it has seemed due and proper that, to the extent of my power, I should add my bit to the information which other Senators are so ably placing before them. For assuredly it is one of the calamities of this situation that of the hundred million of us who are to sign this great promissory note, but a paltry few thousand will be able to read it before signature. And that, Mr. President, is at once my reason and my excuse for again intruding my voice in this discussion, for it is the duty of each of us who are charged with the responsibility of speaking and acting for the people in this matter to give to them in as concrete and understandable a form as we may the actual provisions of this document. The people will judge this matter rightly if they but know and understand its facts.

But unfortunately this treaty, intricate, ponderous, and voluminous as it is, yet is by no means the whole story. Many documents involved in its making are before neither the Senate nor the people.

Within the last week the Committee on Foreign Relations requested that the proceedings of the peace conference and the documents connected therewith should be furnished for our information. The reply was that all were not here, only those immediately at hand having been brought, and that those here were being sorted and some would be finally sent to us. Why should these documents need sorting? Do they hold secrets it is thought best the American people should not know?

Nor have we yet the treaties with Germany's allies—the former Austro-Hungarian Empire, Bulgaria, and Turkey—all of whom, if we may credit report, are to be dismembered or shorn of territory, or both. The provisions of the treaty before us are intimately and inevitably entwined with those of these other treaties. Can we wisely proceed without those treaties and treat this situation piecemeal?

It was only this morning that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee handed me a most important treaty, which has already been completed and agreed upon—the treaty relating to international air navigation—access to which he was only able to get through the British market at 9 pence per copy.

If the negotiators found it necessary, as they did, to consider the whole situation at one time that they might arrive at harmonious arrangements, must not we also to act intelligently and wisely have everything before us?

What is it, sir, about these things that the people can not know? What is there to hide from them? Must we take this thing, as the German people must take it, unsight and unseen? Are we to be no more advantaged than our fallen enemies? We are asking neither for a Saar Basin, a Fiume, nor a Shantung. We have no hope or desire of aggrandizement to be disappointed. We want merely to know what we are promising to do.

Mr. President, a treaty of peace has two great functions: In the first place it ends the war and brings back peace; and in the next place it gives to the victor his spoils which normally take the form of territorial adjustments and monetary or other indemnity, either merely to make good his losses, or in addition to impose a penalty. If the victor be guided by a wise statesmanship, he so accommodates his spoils as not to sow seeds for another conflict with his erstwhile enemy. The great war now ending was bottomed on Bismarck's violation of this fundamental principle. France overlooked her indemnity, but she never forgot or forgave Alsace-Lorraine. There is, I warn you, Senators, many another Alsace-Lorraine in the treaty laid before us for action.

The first of the named functions of a peace treaty is performed in this case not by an article specifically declaring that the treaty brings peace to the parties belligerent but by two widely separated clauses, one at the very beginning of the document and another at the very end of it, from which you spell out the time and occasion of the termination of this conflict. The initial clause, which follows the recitation of the persons signing, says:

> From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment, and subject to the provisions of this treaty, official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the allied and associated powers.

In the last article, the fourth and third clauses preceding the testimonial clause, read as follows:

> A first procès verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the treaty has been ratified by Germany, on the one hand, and by three of the principal allied and associated powers, on the other hand.
> From the date of this first procès verbal the treaty will come into force between the high contracting parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the treaty.

Germany and Great Britain have already ratified the treaty. So soon therefore as the treaty has been ratified by any two of the remaining principal allied and associated powers, the remaining powers being the United States, France, Italy, and Japan, and when the procès verbal of such deposit of ratifications has been drawn up, "the state of war will terminate," as a reading of the many treaty clauses, coming into force at that time and making the further conduct of the war impossible, will clearly show.

It results from the foregoing that in order to bring peace between us and Germany it is not necessary that we shall ratify this treaty. It is true Congress need not accept this treaty termination of our belligerency, and might by proper resolution, either joint, concurrent, or by separate resolution to the same effect by the Senate and House, respectively, continue this war, because to Congress exclusively belongs the authority to create a status of war, and therefore it might continue such a status by a new declaration. But Congress has no desire to do and will not do this thing.

On the other hand, Congress, while it can not negotiate a peace with the enemy, can nevertheless end hostilities with him by declaring as no longer existant the status of war with him, which the Congress created by its own act.

Thus so soon as the first procès verbal is drawn under this treaty, Congress may with all propriety, and should to insure full legality to the act of the Executive in negotiating this particular treaty provision, pass a resolution—concurrent, because the Executive having already committed himself to the substance thereof, his approval would be superfluous—which shall declare that the status of war created by its resolution of April 6, 1917, no longer exists, and that a status of peace from that moment obtains. Thus we shall put the country immediately upon a complete peace basis and may at once resume all our normal commercial and other relations with Germany, unhampered by any restrictions. So much for that part of the treaty which ends the war.

I pass now to the second branch of the treaty, which comprises its whole volume aside from the brief clauses I have quoted, and which deals with the victor's spoils.

In order that we may better appraise the value of the provisions to which I shall call your attention it seems well that we recall the bearings of the course we laid for ourselves when we entered this war, when we literally pledged the lives of our own sons to the accomplishment of a purpose stated—a pledge redeemed in full necessary measure as the mourning in 50,000 homes bears witness. To refresh our recollection of a few salient facts, I shall, in the first place, read the words of President Wilson when he invited Congress to declare war. Said he, after adverting to the course of the Imperial German Government in submarine warfare:

> I advise that the Congress declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the Government and people of the United States: that it formally accept the status of belligerent which has thus been thrust upon it; and that it take immediate steps not only to put the country in a more thorough state of defense but also to exert all its power and employ all its resources to bring the Government of the German Empire to terms and end the war.

A little later in the same address he said:

> We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government acted in entering the war. It was not with their previous knowledge and approval.

Still further on, asserting that Prussian autocracy—> has filled our unsuspecting communities and even our offices of Government with spies and set criminal intrigues everywhere afoot against our national unity of counsel, our peace within and without, our industries, and our commerce—

He said:

> We knew that their source lay not in any hostile feeling or purpose of the German people toward us—who were no doubt as ignorant of them as we ourselves were—but only in the selfish designs of a Government that did what it pleased and told its people nothing.

Again, still later:

> We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included; for the rights of nations great and small and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy.

And finally he said:

> It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in a high spirit of right and fairness, because we act without animus, not in enmity toward a people or with a desire to bring injury or disadvantage upon them, but only in armed opposition to an irresponsible Government which has thrown aside all consideration of humanity and of right and is running amuck. We are, let me say again, the sincere friends of the German people, and shall desire nothing so much as the early reestablishment of intimate relations of mutual advantage between us

Or, to put it shortly, our purposes as stated by Mr. Wilson were threefold—first, the defeat and elimination of the Imperial German Government and Prussian autocracy; next, the liberation from their yoke of despotism of the German people themselves—for whom we had nothing but sympathy and friendship—to the end that they might be masters of their own fates and fortunes; and, lastly, the reestablishment, as sincere friends of the German people, "of intimate relations of mutual advantage between them and us."

But we here in Congress were not quite so sure-footed in our estimate of our relations to the German people in case we went to war. It became difficult for us to work out just how we could confine our hostility to the Imperial German Government when the German people and not the German royalty were to shoot down our sons, and while we were bending all our efforts to kill the German people. But we did see this in the situation: Our own citizens of German ancestry were among our best, most stalwart, and freedom-loving, patriotic citizens, whose ancestors in many cases had fled Germany to escape the despotism against which we were about to wage war. We recalled that the Teutonic peoples were in origin and early tradition a free people who knew no masters. And we judged that rid of those rulers who had debauched their intellects for generations this mighty people would reassert their racial characteristics as had their sons who had come to us, and that they would become in turn a great, free people, as they had been a great monarchical nation. And this is my faith to-day, if we but give that great people a fair chance, consistent with the punishment they have earned and must suffer.

But no one here was such an ecstatic as to conceive that, going forward, we should not make war on the German people, or that before the war should end we should not have engendered hostility toward them. Congress, therefore, on April 6, four days after the delivery of the President's address, declared in a joint resolution the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government, solemnly affirmed that the Imperial Government had so "committed repeated acts of war against the Government and people of the United States" that a state of war has been thrust upon them by that Government, and therefore formally pledged the whole military and national resources of the country to "bring the conflict to a successful termination."

These were the aims, the purposes, and the reasons for entry into the conflict as stated in our former record. How mighty was the accord of our whole people therein was shown by their full and quick approval of the measures Congress took to make good the pledge we gave—the passing of the selective-service act and of the measures imposing our enormous financial powers and obligations.

These were the ends and the purposes which threw into the conflict with their whole hearts and souls our great, splendid body of loyal citizens of German ancestry. Fired with the spirit of liberty and freedom and weighted with the blessings of free Government, they saw in the war an opportunity to bring to the home folk in the old fatherland the same inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Their sons rushed to our standards to fight first that we might continue to live free and next that liberty and its blessings might come to their kindred across the sea.

We did have, we had to have, a quarrel with the German people; it was inevitable that we should entertain toward them hostile feelings. But we had and have a sympathy for them as misguided and misdirected, and we did hope that winning the war we should liberate them from an intellectual despotism they seemed not to sense, and that thereafter they would arise a free, great people.

So we entered the war. Eighteen months later Germany, staggering, asked for an armistice to arrange a peace. Before the armistice was granted the Emperor and the Crown Prince fled their dominions, followed by certain of their military chieftains. Next came the abdication of the Emperor and the initiation of proceedings looking to the democratization of Germany.

Thus, prima facie, we had achieved the full purpose for which we entered the war; our enemy was defeated, the Imperial Government destroyed, and the German people were liberated, free—again quoting the President—to "choose their way of life and of obedience."

Following this came the signing of the armistice of November 11, the terms of which wisely and properly put it beyond the power of Germany thereafter effectively to continue this war.

There we, who sought no territory, nor indemnity, nor aggrandized power, should have rested, signed our peace when our associates made peace, and quit the war as we entered it, still free and independent, masters of our own destiny, able to work for the benefit of all mankind, unhampered by entangling alliances or commitments.

We should have left the political adjustments and the indemnities to the powers of Europe who alone were immediately concerned, we at most exercising a restraining hand to see, first, that justice was done to a fallen foe—and this in spite of the fact that he initiated and carried out the most cruel, relentless, inhuman war of modern times—and in the next place to insure that no more dragon's teeth were sown in Europe than the indispensable necessities imperatively required. Such a course would neither have endangered nor sacrificed those threatened peoples to whose assistance we came, for Germany had been disarmed, and our two millions of young men, now for the first time fairly equipped, were still in France at the behest of any military exigency which might arise.

But such was not the course followed, and our representatives sat at the peace table as coequal negotiators.

Twenty-seven powers (besides Germany) have signed this treaty. Five of these—the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan—are designated as the principal allied and associated powers. These 5 with the other 22 signing the treaty (besides Germany) are termed the allied and associated powers. Of these 22, 4 only were European powers in existence at the outbreak of the war, namely, Belgium, Greece, Portugal, and Roumania; 3 others of Europe are created or recognized by the treaty—Poland, Czechoslovakia, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, the boundaries of which nor its location the treaty does not disclose. Of the remaining 15 States, 3 are Asiatic—Siam, China—who has the sole distinction of being robbed by her allies—and the Hedjaz—likewise with undefined boundaries and, as to the treaty, unlocated. The 11 remaining States are of Latin-America as follows: Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Ecuador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, and Uruguay. I have mentioned these 22 States so we may have clearly in mind the fact that all of them combined could not under the most favorable conditions one could hope for, withstand the armies of Germany one day, or enforce against Germany's will the most inoffensive treaty stipulation. In the domain of force, in which Germany has lived and will continue for a time to live, these powers count for naught. The great responsibilities of the treaty, the only power behind the treaty, is that of the five principal allied and associated powers. Nor does the treaty in any of its parts blink this. There is no single important function in the treaty performable by the victor powers which is not consigned to the five great powers. There is no single important immediate function consigned to the league of nations which does not run to the council of the league which these five powers control and of which they are the sanctioning force. The small powers are named that may be granted benefits. The load of the world, the keeping of the peace of the world, under this treaty rests on the five powers.

But there is one power we miss in all this, the power which met the brunt of the German shock while the rest of the world got ready; the power that mobilized in the allied cause some 21,000,000 men; that lost—killed in action—2,500,000; that lost in other casualties 3,500,000, of whom 1,500,000 are absolute invalids and badly mutilated; that lost in prisoners 2,000,000, of whom half died in prison; a power whose armies at the beginning of February in 1917 numbered 14,000,000 men under arms; who fought during the war over a front of 3,500 miles, and who had there pitted against her one-third of the whole German Army, two-thirds of the whole Austrian Army, all of the Hungarian Army, and two-thirds of the whole Turkish Army; a power who took as prisoners of war 400,000 Germans, 300,000 Hungarians, 300,000 Turks, and 1,000,000 Austrians. I speak of poor, ever despot-ridden Russia. I have but said China enjoyed a unique position; but I spoke in haste. Russia, who raised three times as many men as we planned to raise as a maximum; Russia, whose losses if imposed on us would have made every home in this land a house of mourning; Russia, whose men in battle front, unarmed and unequipped, stopped the German onrush of cold steel with bare breasts and clenched fists, so saving us and Europe from slavery; Russia, whose people and rulers stood forefront, our friends, even in the hours of our sore and most threatening distress; this Russia, with this record, is mentioned in this treaty, but only with ominous words that presage her national destruction.

Russia, sir, is a problem; but dismemberment by others is not its solution. And shall I tell you, Mr. President, what the intelligent Russians, those of the great so-called middle classes, are saying? It is this: We must first recover ourselves and wipe out the dishonor of our collapse, the dishonor of forsaking our Allies in the hour of their dire need. And then we must readjust our dominions as we wish them, for Russia can never be bound by the Russia-disposing portions of a treaty to which Russia is not a party. And I ask you, sir, would we?

And this thought brings me to speak again of what I have said heretofore, that this treaty, stripped of its meaningless beatific provisions, provides merely and simply for an alliance between the five great powers in a coalition against the balance of the world. And again I ask, has history ever answered this save in one way—by destroying the coalition and at times all or some of its constituent members?

Think you Germany—smarting and staggering under the terms of this the hardest treaty of modern times—will, even if we were to set up the league and she should join it, supinely rest content with the dole of grace and sufferance we are vouchsafing her, the crumbs from her victors' table? It is beside the point to say that such is but her just deserts and the full measure thereof. Lacking the wisdom to go forward and inflict a military punishment that would have uprooted their philosophy of force and taught them the lesson of live and let live, we have left them beaten but proud and arrogant, with their mighty spirit bent for the time but unbroken, with their damning philosophy unchanged, and with a will, fired by hate, to mete out revenge.

That people will no more cease to plot and plan to recover their former high estate than did Satan, plunged into the abysmal depths of Hell. Whether they are in the league if formed or out of it, Germany's agents, secretly or openly, will be at work with her former allies, and with injured Russia, and with Japan, whose conceptions, ideals, aspirations, and ambitions are of Imperial Germany, not democratic America, Britain, and France. As Russia goes so will go the whole Slavic and affiliated peoples. And if Germany succeed in this and be able to unite these powers to herself, to turn the teeming millions of Russia to swell her own ranks, and to augment this by the great yellow races of the Pacific, who, through Russia, would have unimpeded access to the battle front, western Europe, at least, must perish. Think you, Germany, revengeful, will turn aside from so imposing and grateful a vision in order to grace for generations a conqueror's triumph?

Why have we invited this vision? Was there none at all of that much-vaunted forward looking at the peace table? The wise, the obviously wise, course required not months of inventing and piling up penalties, but a few hours devoted to a plan that should rid Germany of the Hohenzollerns, that should provide for her democratization, that should impose a lesson-bearing indemnity, and that should then bind with rivets of steel, because rivets of friendship, the German people to western Europe, to France, who can not hope to keep Germany under her feet. Napoleon tried to conquer a people and failed. This should be France's lesson. The only possible wise course for France, her only permanent safety, is closest friendship with Germany. The restoration of Alsace-Lorraine, the payment of a suitable indemnity, and then forgetfulness as to the past, hard as that might prove—this should have sufficed. It may seem I am unsympathetic, unmindful, and forgetful of wrongs and injuries, unmoved by suffering and grief. I am none of these. I am trying to point out how France herself might escape further and more overwhelming wrong, suffering, and grief. For as certain as the sun rises, if we follow the road in which this treaty sets our feet, France and ourselves shall meet those on the way.

The treaty of peace is divided into 15 parts. All of them deal with territorial adjustments, penalties, and indemnities of the war except Part I—containing the covenant of the league of nations—and Part XIII, labor—providing for an international labor organization. The other parts are, in their order: Part II, boundaries of Germany; Part III, political clauses for Europe; Part IV, German rights and interests outside Germany; Part V, military, naval, and air clauses; Part VI, prisoners of war and graves; Part VII, penalties; Part VIII, reparation; Part IX, financial clauses; Part X, economic clauses; Part XI, aerial navigation; Part XII, ports, waterways, and railways; Part XIV, guaranties; and Part XV, miscellaneous provisions.

It is of course impossible to give even a detailed summary of a volume of some eighty thousand odd words, doubtless the longest treaty in history. But I shall only aim to give a picture of certain general features to which I wish to invite special attention.

By this treaty Germany cedes outright portions of her European territory to Belgium; to France, a recession of Alsace-Lorraine; to Poland; to the Czecho-Slovak State; and to the principal allied and associated powers, including the United States, who get unconditionally Memel—a small strip of territory in the extreme northeastern tip of Germany—and the free city of Danzig with its adjacent territory, to be placed under the protection of the league of nations. Germany also cedes, contingent upon the wishes of the people in the area affected as expressed by a vote, further portions of her territory to Belgium, to Poland, and to the allied and associated powers, who thus take Schleswig with an obligation at some time to hand it over to Denmark if the people so vote. The Czecho-Slovak State secures a further bit of territory if a determination of the Polish frontier should isolate it from Germany; and the league of nations takes as trustee the Saar Basin, which shall be governed, however, by a commission appointed, not by the league but by the council of the league, pending the plebiscite of 15 years hence. Thus the United States becomes the owner in fee of a tenant in common of European territory and a trustee as to other territory.

For this territory so ceded nobody pays Germany anything, nor is any credit allowed Germany for it on her reparation account, to which I shall shortly refer. However, all cessionary powers, except France and the league of nations as to the Saar Basin, assume that portion of the imperial and State debt attaching to the ceded area—fixed, stated roughly, upon the basis of the prewar revenue of the area to the prewar total imperial and State revenue, respectively.

The imperial and State property in all these areas, including the private property of the former German Emperor and other royal personages, is turned over to the cessionary of the area, who must pay the value of the same to reparation commission, which places the same to the credit of Germany on the reparation account. This does not apply to France, who takes such property in Alsace-Lorraine without payment, nor to Belgium, nor to the Saar Basin.

Germany cedes all her overseas possessions in fee simple to the allied and associated powers, who do not assume the debts and who take all the property, without any compensation whatever running to Germany, either for the territory ceded or for the actual property taken. Thus the United States becomes a tenant in common with the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, of Germany's African possessions, comprising Togo, Kamerun, German Southwest Africa, and German East Africa, with an area of nearly 1,000,000 square miles—almost one-third the size of the United States—and a native population of about eleven and a half millions; of her Pacific possessions, including Kaiser Wilhelm's Land, Bismarck's Archipelago, Carolina Island, Palau or Pelew Islands, Marianne Islands, Solomon Islands, and Marshall Islands. It may be noted in passing that certain of these island possessions form a barrier ring to access to the Philippines, and their possession by any other power other than ourselves is big with potential troubles for us.

Germany cedes also, without compensation of any sort or description, her extraterritorial and analogous rights in Siam, Morocco, Egypt, and Samoa, and recognizes the French protectorate in Morocco and the British protectorate in Egypt. The imperial and State property in these areas go to the cessionaries without compensation. The same is true of such property located in and ceded to China. Germany's rights in Shantung and German property also are ceded to Japan "free and clear of all charges and encumbrances."

Thus territorially Germany has been closed out in all the world without a penny's compensation. Moreover, she loses the efforts of a generation to provide an outlet for her rapidly increasing surplus population, which now must and will find expanding room elsewhere. To this situation is added a restriction of Germany's European area, which would have taken care of a part of this expansion.

The indemnities provided by the treaty may be classed roughly into two divisions: (1) Restitution in cash of cash taken away, seized, or sequestrated, and also restitution of animals, objects of every nature, and securities taken away, seized, or sequestrated in the cases in which it proves possible to identify them in territory belonging to Germany or to her allies; and (2) reparation for all the damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied or associated power against Germany by her aggression by land, by sea, and from the air, and this includes damages inflicted not only by Germany but by Germany's allies, and also by the allied and associated powers themselves upon their own nationals.

There can, of course, be no question as to the propriety of compelling Germany to disgorge the loot which she seized and which she still has, nor in requiring her to replace that which she seized and has since consumed or otherwise used or destroyed. No matter what this may mean to Germany, no matter how it may leave her, this must be done. The thief must not be heard to plead necessity for the article he stole nor inconvenience from restoring it. This is the most elemental justice and the wholesomest morality. Thus far we move on solid ground.

But when we get away from and go beyond this, it behooves us to proceed with care, lest we go beyond the bounds of wise statesmanship and, in the homely adage, kill the goose that we expect to lay the golden eggs.

But the treaty edges in on the perfectly proper theory of restitution by a theory designated as replacement, which places Germany under rather startling obligations. She is first made to "recognize (s) the right of the allied and associated powers to the replacement, ton for ton (gross tonnage) and class for class, of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war." She then acknowledges "that the tonnage of German shipping at present in existence is much less than that lost by the allied and associated powers in consequence of the German aggression," and agrees that "the right thus recognized will be enforced on German ships and boats under the following conditions": Germany cedes to the allied and associated powers, on behalf of herself and of all other parties interested, all German merchant ships which are of 1,600 tons gross and upward. Included in these will doubtless be the 32 auxiliary cruisers and fleet auxiliary—named in another part of the treaty—which are to be disarmed and treated as merchant ships. In addition to the foregoing, Germany further cedes one-half, reckoned in tonnage, of the ships which are between 1,000 tons and 1,600 tons gross; one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the steam trawlers; and one-quarter, reckoned in tonnage, of the other fishing boats. All the foregoing must be delivered to the reparation commission within two months of the coming into force of the present treaty.

Thus, we take practically all of Germany's means of conducting commerce through her own vessels with overseas countries, of whom we are the farthest away and of which we shall stand most in need, for it is an open secret that before the war the German shipping was the peer at least of any shipping in the world.

But the treaty goes further than this and compels Germany to lay down in her own shipyards a maximum of 200,000 tons of shipping for each of the next five years—approximately half, I am told, of her shipbuilding capacity—and our representatives, the reparation commission, determine the specifications, conditions of building, price to be paid—by giving credit against the reparation bill the commission will make up—and all other questions relating to the accounting, building, and delivery of the ships.

Thus, for a number of years at least, we have pretty effectively barred German vessels from the seas.

But this is only half the story. She is also in good part stripped of her inland shipping, for by this treaty she very properly undertakes to restore in kind and in normal condition of upkeep to the allied and associated powers any boats and other movable appliances belonging to inland navigation which since August 1, 1914, have by any means whatever come into her possession or into the possession of her nationals, and which can be identified. This would, of course, cover boats purchased by Germans for full value, transactions that might have been carried out through neutrals.

Nor is this all. With a view to making good the loss of the allied and associated powers in inland-navigation tonnage which can not be made good by the restitution already recited, Germany agrees to cede to the reparation commission a portion of her river fleet up to the amount of the loss mentioned to a maximum extent of 20 per cent of the river fleet as it existed November 11, 1918.

As to all the foregoing ocean-going and inland-navigation vessels, Germany agrees to take any measures indicated to her by the reparation commission for obtaining the full title to the property in all ships which have during the war been transferred, or are in process of transfer, to neutral flags without the consent of the allied and associated Governments.

Nor is this all. She waives all claims against the allied or associated powers for the detention, employment, loss, or damage of any German ships, except as called for by the armistice agreement; all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by naval action, and subsequently salved, in which the nationals of the allied and associated powers or the powers themselves may be interested either as owners, charterers, insurers, or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a prize court of Germany or her allies.

But I am compelled to note still further shipping deliveries. The treaty obliges Germany to cede to France tugs and vessels from among those remaining registered in German Rhine ports—after the above deductions—to an amount fixed not by the treaty even in maximum but by an arbitrator appointed by the United States. The tugs and vessels so taken must have with them their fittings and gear, shall be in a good state of repair to carry on traffic, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

Similarly and under like conditions, tugs and vessels to an unnamed amount must be transferred to the allied and associated powers from those used on the river systems of the Elbe, the Oder, the Niemen, and the Danube; and, in addition, Germany must cede material of all kinds necessary for the utilization of these river systems by the allied and associated powers concerned.

France also gets all installations, berthing and anchorage accommodations, platforms, docks, warehouses, plants, and so forth, which German subjects or German companies owned on August 1, 1914, in Rotterdam, and the shares or interests possessed by such nationals or companies therein.

Thus seemingly under a theory of replacement the treaty likewise strips Germany of much of her inland shipping.

The effect of all this upon Germany's future and upon her ability to meet the other requirements of this treaty are well worthy of deep and mature reflection.

But drastic and possibly ruinous as all this is, it yet is but the beginning.

The next inroad on the doctrine of restitution is made under the name of physical restoration. Germany undertakes to devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the allied and associated powers to the extent that these powers may determine. Under this provision the allied and associated Governments may list the animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character which have been seized, consumed, or destroyed by Germany or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations—this would include military operations by the allied and associated powers themselves—which such powers urgently and immediately need and which they desire to have replaced by animals and articles of the same nature in being in Germany at the coming into force of this treaty. As an immediate advance of animals on this account, Germany must within three months deliver to France 30,500 horses, 92,000 cattle, 101,000 sheep, and 10,000 goats; and to Belgium 10,200 horses, 92,000 cattle, 20,200 sheep, and 15,000 sows. As to such animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character, the reparation commission in deciding the amount which shall ultimately be given by Germany must take into consideration German's needs, having in mind the maintenance of German's social and economic life and the general interest of the allied and associated powers that the industrial life of Germany shall not be so impaired as adversely to affect Germany's ability to perform the other acts of reparation called for. It is, however, provided that of machinery, tools, equipment, and like commercial articles a maximum of 30 per cent may be taken of the quantity actually in use in any one establishment.

Similar lists, subject to the same regulations, may be made by the allied and associated powers of reconstruction materials—stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, and so forth—machinery, heating apparatus, and like commercial articles which the powers may desire to have produced in Germany.

In addition to the foregoing and of like character is the obligation of Germany to furnish coal to France at France's option, up to a maximum of 20,000,000 tons for each of the first five years and 8,000,000 tons for any one of the succeeding five years; to Belgium, at her option, 8,000,000 tons per year for 10 years; to Italy, at her option, amounts beginning at 4,500,000 tons for the first year and increasing to 8,500,000 tons for the last six years; and to Luxembourg, her annual prewar supply, if the reparation commission so directs; a possible total of 32,000,000 to 35,000,000 tons for the first five years and of 25,000,000 tons for the next five years. At the option of the vendees, metallurgical coke instead of coal must be delivered at fixed ratios. In this category also is to be placed the German obligation to deliver to France for the next three successive years some 115,000 tons of coal distillation products, and to the reparation commission 50 per cent of the total dyestuffs and chemical drugs in Germany or under German control at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty.

In considering the question of supplying coal we must not lose sight of the cession of the Saar Basin coal mines to France.

But we come now to an item which is not to be accounted for as restitution, as replacement, or physical restoration. I refer to the cession by Germany on her own behalf and on behalf of her nationals of her submarine cables. By this act the treaty takes from Germany all direct telegraph relations with overseas countries.

As a final entry under this general head I wish to observe that, speaking generally, Germany also cedes to the States which secure portions of her territory all railways situated therein, and I find in the treaty no positive provision for the payment therefor by anyone. This cession carries with it the works and installations; the rolling stock, complete where a ceded road has its own stock, in a normal state of upkeep, and where a ceded road has no rolling stock of its own, then rolling stock from German lines with which the ceded portion forms a system; and stocks of stores, fittings, and plants. And while on this point I may add that Germany must build for Czechoslovakia a designated railroad if that State so elects, at the latter's cost, and must build for Belgium the German portion of a deep-draft Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway at her own cost, seemingly, if Belgium decides the canal should be built.

Now, as to the bill against Germany. Germany is made to admit as a basis of her liability the responsibility for herself, and for all her allies, for causing all the loss and damage to which the allied and associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war.

The allied and associated powers, recognizing the burden thus stated is too heavy for German resources to bear "after taking into account permanent diminution of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present treaty," require, and she so undertakes, that Germany make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of belligerency of each as an allied or associated power, by land, by sea, and by air.

The reparation commission is to find one bill against Germany for this damage, the elements of which are of such importance that I feel I ought to cover them in some detail. They are as follows: 1. Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including all attacks on land, on sea, or in the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising. 2. Damage to civilian persons, caused by Germany or her allies, by acts of cruelty, violence, or maltreatment—including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment, or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labor—wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims. 3. Damage to civilian persons injured either in German territory or invaded territory, caused by Germany or her allies by acts injurious to health or capacity to work or to honor, as well as to their surviving dependents. 4. Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war. 5. As damages, the pensions and compensations in the nature of pensions to naval and military—including members of the air force—victims, whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, sums so due to be capitalized on the basis of the French scale in force on the coming into effect of the present treaty. 6. The cost of assistance extended to prisoners of war and their families. 7. Allowances by the Governments of the Allies and associated powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving in the forces, the sum to be paid to be capitalized on the basis of the French scale in force during the year the payment was made. 8. Damage to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to work without just remuneration. 9. Damage to all property, wherever situated, belonging to any of the allied or associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval or military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured, or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea, or from the air, or damages directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war. 10. Damages in the form of levies, fines, and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her allies upon the civil population.

It is admitted that certain of these damage rules violate the principles of international law as hitherto recognized and observed by the family of nations. The reason why we as well as the enemy should discard such benign principles as have been worked out by the nations in the last centuries is not clear.

The thought has been entertained that the treaty fixes, at least tentatively, the German indemnity under these rules at 120,000,000,000 gold marks, about $24,000,000,000, but such an idea is not justified.

In the first place, Germany agrees, in addition to the sum named, to pay Belgium's debt to the Allies and associated powers, whatever the debt may be. This payment is to be considered restoration.

In the next place, the treaty stipulates that the $24,000,000,000 worth of gold bonds which Germany undertakes to issue is to cover "whatever part of the full amount of the approved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities, and commodities, or otherwise." Thus the total values of all the materials to be turned over as heretofore mentioned seem quite clearly to be in addition to this $24,000,000,000 of gold bonds.

Moreover, it is provided that "further issues [of bonds] by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the [reparation] commission subsequently determined from time to time."

So that the bill against Germany will clearly not stop at $24,000,000,000 and may run to any amount.

I may here also correct another impression that has gone out, namely, that somehow the reparation commission can reduce the amounts to be paid by Germany, if they decide such a course is wise and just. Now, the reparation commission is made up of representatives of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy, who always sit at its sessions, and the representatives of one other power, either Belgium, Japan, or the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. While each other allied and associated power may have a representative present when its interests are involved, such representative may not vote. This commission decides the amount of the claims against Germany by a majority vote; that is to say, the representatives of Great Britain, France, and Italy, or Belgium, or Japan, or the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, any three of them, may fix the amount of this indemnity. But a decision to cancel the whole or any part of the German debt or obligation requires a unanimous vote of all of them sitting, and before this decision can become operative the commission must have the specific authority of the several Governments represented on the commission. In other words, unless the four great powers and Belgium or Japan or the Serb-Croat-Slovene State unanimously so agree, the claims once fixed by a majority of the commission can not be abated one penny except by the consent of all the powers represented on the commission. Moreover, the commission is closely limited even as to the postponement of total or partial reparation payments, for all such postponements beyond 1930 of payments falling due between May 1, 1921, and the end of 1926, and of any postponement, for more than three years, of any installment falling due after 1926 requires a unanimous vote.

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that some one of the powers represented on the commission is determined to exact the pound of flesh, there is no way under this treaty to prevent it, short of the application of coercive measures. The reparation commission is not and is not intended to be a beneficent philanthropic, or eleemosynary institution; it is and must be the enforcer of stern retribution, imposing on the vanquished the utmost burden his back will bear.

But these measures are by no means the end of the story. Reference has already been made to the payment by Germany in securities of what I shall designate her nonbond debt. On this point I quote from the treaty:

> Germany will within six months from the coming into force of the present treaty deliver to each allied and associated power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights, or interests situated in the territory of that allied or associated power, including any shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that power.

That is to say, German investments in allied or associated countries and held in Germany are to be wholly closed out.

Moreover, all other property held by Germans or German companies in allied or associated countries, or territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, may be retained or liquidated by such powers. This completes the closing out of German interests in allied and associated countries. Nor is this all, for this last provision applies to territories ceded to the allied and associated powers by this treaty, so that Poland, Czechoslovakia, the free city of Danzig, the principal allied and associated powers in Memel, Denmark, Belgium, and France may sell out property and interest of every German national or company within their newly acquired territory.

Furthermore, the reparation commission may require, by a majority vote, the German Government to acquire and turn over to it the rights and interests of German nationals in any public utility or concession operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria, or in the possessions or dependencies of these States, or in any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies, or to be administered by a mandatory under this treaty.

Nor is this the end. Germany must fully compensate, and most properly so, the nationals of all allied and associated powers for the losses they have suffered with reference to property located in German territory, and this includes all property acquired or in course of acquisition by the German alien property custodian, this compensation to be reduced by the actual value of any property restored to the owners.

For all property rights or interests taken by the allied and associated powers from German nationals, Germany undertakes to compensate them.

Now, the disposition of the proceeds of all this German property is obviously of the utmost importance. The treaty proposes two methods, one of which is so fantastic that it is difficult to believe our wildest dreamer would, on study, care to adopt it. I shall give you the effect of a few of its salient features: If we should proceed under it, the United States would guarantee the payment of all specified debts owed by our citizens—who were solvent at the beginning of the war—to Germans. We would establish a clearing office which would take over all such debts due to our citizens from Germans, and we would undertake to act as a collection agent for all such debts due from our citizens to Germans, making good any we did not collect. From the coming into force of this treaty all payments or acceptance of payments and all communications regarding the settlement of specified obligations would be absolutely prohibited between our citizens and Germans, under penalties imposed for trading with the enemy, except correspondence through our clearing office, and each Government would promise to do its utmost to ferret out and report violations of the prohibitions to the others.

If an American citizen made a claim which was not allowed, he would be fined. If he contested a claim which was allowed, he would be fined. Where he and the German could not agree, the two clearing offices would settle it if they could; if they could not agree, it would go to the mixed arbitral tribunal. If, finally, a debt were held either by the clearing offices or the mixed tribunal not to be within the specified classes, permission is graciously given to the parties to go to court.

When all such debts are liquidated any credit balance in favor of Germany goes to the reparation commission to be credited on Germany's account. That is to say, the excess proceeds of German property in the United States would go to compensate Italian or Greek or some other power's losses.

If this clearing-office system be not adopted, then Germany pays directly to the allied and associated Governments, or their interested nationals, the cash assets and the proceeds of the property, rights, and interests in her hands belonging to them; but each of the allied and associated powers shall dispose of the proceeds of the property rights and interests and of the cash assets of German nationals in accordance with its laws and regulations. They may apply them if they wish to the payment of claims and debts held by their nationals against German nationals, including claims against the German Government for acts committed by it after July 31, 1914, and before the particular power concerned entered the war against Germany. Or, and this is most remarkable, the power may use this money derived from the proceeds of property owned by German nationals to pay debts due the power's nationals from nationals of German allies. That is, we may use German money to pay a Turk's debt.

And in all of this it is well to remember that by the treaty the property rights and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken against them.

It had not been and is not my purpose to attempt a discussion of the number of provisions of this instrument which run counter to our constitutional guaranties, but I can not forbear the observation that no one will, I apprehend, be so hardy as to contend that, peace being established, we shall continue to have power to take private property without compensation.

Under this plan also the excess of German property over American debts will go to the reparation commission, if we retain the excess. The treaty is not clear as to any other disposition of the surplus.

Now, for all this German property so disposed of, and for which Germany assumes liability to her own nationals, no credit is given on the reparation account, save as to that part which may be ultimately turned over to the reparation commission.

One point more and I shall be done with this part of the treaty. It is stipulated that all investments wheresoever affected with the cash assets of nationals of the high contracting parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever, shall be annulled. That is to say, either the treaty annuls or we obligate ourselves to annul all investments by our Alien Property Custodian of enemy funds. The disposition of such funds is not clear.

Thus we close out German interests in all allied and associated countries.

But we also take other commercial measures no less far-reaching. The treaty terminates all multilateral treaties to which Germany is a part except those specifically named in the instrument, and all bilateral treaties and conventions between her and other powers save only those which the other powers notify their intention to revive. Thus another presumed tenet of international law passes out with this treaty.

Moreover, under this treaty the allied and associated powers acquire all the treaty and conventional rights and advantages enjoyed by Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, or Turkey, and such rights and advantages granted to and enjoyed by nonbelligerent States or their nationals since August 1, 1914, so long as such treaties, conventions, or agreements remain in force. Thus no power having with Germany a treaty which gave to Germany a favored position at the expense of the power will revive such a treaty, and every power having a treaty which gives her an advantage over Germany will revive that treaty. Furthermore, if Germany shall undertake to make with any foreign country any reciprocity treaty in regard to the importation, exportation, or transit of any goods, then all favors, immunities, and privileges granted by it shall simultaneously and unconditionally and without request or compensation be extended to all the allied and associated States. The treaty thus effectually prevents Germany from fostering her commerce by special trade agreements with other countries.

The tariff and customs provisions are equally drastic. Notwithstanding the increased costs of production throughout the world, Germany may not, for the first six months after the coming into force of this treaty, impose higher tariffs than the most favorable duties applied to imports into Germany on July 31, 1914; and for a period of 30 months thereafter the same rule shall apply to all imports covered by a designated schedule which enjoyed rates conventionalized by treaties, to which imports are added other named articles.

Furthermore, as to all duties, charges, prohibitions, and restrictions on both exports and imports, the allied and associated powers enjoy favored-nation treatment. I shall make no attempt even to list the exceptional tariff privileges granted to France, to Poland, to Luxemburg, to Morocco, and to Egypt.

The nationals of allied and associated powers resident in Germany have as to all measures relating to occupation, professions, trade, and industry most-favored-nation treatment; and as to taxes, charges, and imports, direct or indirect, touching the property rights or interests of nationals or companies of such powers, or restrictions, the treatment must be that accorded to German nationals. In all the foregoing I do not recall one reciprocal favor granted to Germany or her nationals.

The general principle of favored-nation treatment, and in some cases national treatment, is granted to the allied and associated countries and their nationals in all matters referring to transit, which Germany must expedite over and through German territory, and as to all charges connected therewith, all without any reciprocal undertaking in favor of Germany. All regulations governing such traffic must be equal and nondiscriminating as against the allied or associated powers or their nationals. Moreover, all inland traffic, our "coastwise" trade, is open to the vessels of the allied and associated powers on the same terms as German vessels, while Germany may not engage without permission in the like traffic of any other power.

Existing free zones in ports shall be maintained, and, in addition, Germany shall lease to Czechoslovakia areas in Hamburg and Stettin, which shall be placed under the régime of free zones.

Certain specified areas of the great German river systems of the Elbe, the Oder, the Niemen, and additional parts of the Danube, and all navigable parts of these river systems, are internationalized and placed under the administration of international commissions. The internationalization of the Rhine is extended. On these the traffic is open to the vessels of all nations on terms of perfect equality. Special concessions are given to France and Belgium on the Rhine, which need not be further noted.

Finally, Germany undertakes so to adapt her railway rolling stock that it may accommodate the inclusion in German trains of the rolling stock of the allied and associated powers, and that the trains of the latter may incorporate German rolling stock. In addition to this, regulations are laid down as to rates and traffic on through trains, which Germany undertakes to accept and operate.

These are broad statements, covering an almost infinity of details on these various subjects. For no one of these various trade concessions and agreements is Germany given any credit or compensation nor any direct or conspicuous advantage named in the treaty.

In addition to all this, she waives all claims arising out of the internment or repatriation of German nationals and all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of German ships or the liquidation of German property in China and Siam. Germany waives to all of the allied and associated powers and their nationals, as already noted, all claims of any description in respect to the detention, employment—except under the armistice terms—loss, or damage of any German ships or boats, and all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved, in which any of the allied or associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owner, charterer, insurer, or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree or condemnation by a German prize court. Finally, Germany undertakes not to put forward, directly or indirectly, against any allied or associated power signatory of the present treaty, including those which without having declared war have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present treaty, such claims by this provision to be finally and completely barred.

And as a capstone to this whole remarkable edifice let me refer to that provision by which Germany, on the one hand, accepts and agrees to be bound by all decrees and orders concerning German ships and goods made by any prize court of the allied and associated powers and agrees to put forward no claim arising out of such orders and decrees, and on the other hand acknowledges the right of the allied and associated powers to challenge all German prize-court decisions and orders.

As to that part of the treaty which deals with labor, I shall now merely say: Either it will never be enforced as drawn, and perhaps was never intended to be enforced as drawn, but to be merely a sop thrown to labor, or if enforced as written and in the spirit its provisions seem to carry it will wreck the world. It compels the class antagonism between capital and labor which wisdom requires that we lessen, not increase, if we are to remain a free people; and makes possible an ultimate interference of foreign nations in our labor disputes at the instance of residents of our own country.

I regret, sir, that this has been a long and tedious process, but its importance could be satisfied in no other way. It has shown us the treaty takes Germany's territory, European and foreign, without compensation; that it takes from her practically all of her ocean shipping and a large portion of her inland vessels; that it deprives her of all special benefits of treaties and conventions; that it takes her cables; that it compels her to supply large quantities of raw materials; that it internationalizes her great river system and throws them open to traffic of all nations on a national basis as if they were the high seas; that it opens her coastwise shipping to all nations; that it compels her to grant exceptional import and export privileges and to accept important restrictions; that it lays down far-reaching principles governing her internal commerce and transportation; that it closes out German interests in practically the whole civilized world—outside the territories of her late allies—including those areas which have been taken from her and given to others; that it closes out the interests of that same world in Germany. It has shown that having done all this it assesses against her provisionally, with a stipulation permitting an increase, a debt of 120,000,000,000 gold marks, which is in addition to the property restored in kind, and to the value of the boats, gold, and securities delivered; that it makes her responsible for these damages inflicted not only by herself but by her allies, and even by the allied and associated powers themselves, with a list of items which includes some admittedly contrary to the rules of international law hitherto existing and that finally and in addition she is compelled to answer to her own nationals for the value of the property taken by the allied and associated powers.

It remains for me to add that the United States is bound up in every one of the obligations and duties incident to the enforcement of these terms, with the great responsibilities attached thereto.

We are participants, either as one of the principal allied and associated powers, or as a member of the council of the league of nations, in the Belgian, Saar Basin, Czecho-Slovak State, Polish, free city of Danzig, and Schleswig boundary commissions. We are in like manner participants in the Saar Basin governing commission, with all the inevitable difficulties and dangers attached thereto. We participate in plebiscite commissions of Poland, Schleswig, and East Prussia, and the interallied military, naval, and aeronautical commissions of control charged with enforcing the disarmament provisions of this treaty. In addition we have our own prisoners and graves commissions, our own clearing offices if we adopt that method of adjusting the enumerated debts. Finally, we are one of the four powers whose representatives are to sit as a reparation commission to assess damages against Germany, to appraise credits, to judge of her economic requirements as affecting her ability to furnish certain raw materials, to pass on her tax system, to postpone payment on her debts, to prescribe the conditions of her bonds, to recommend abatement of her debt, to appraise the value of public property in ceded territories, and a great bulk of other duties that need not be here referred to, all of which may make or break the peace of Europe, with an obligation on our part that having so participated in the breaking we shall once more contribute our millions of men and our billions of dollars to the readjustments.

In addition to this, the United States is to appoint arbitrators to determine the amount of river craft that shall go to France on the Rhine and to the allied and associated powers—including ourselves—on the Elbe, the Oder, the Niemen, and the Danube, and to determine the conditions under which the international convention relative to the St. Gothard Railway may be denounced.

Mr. President, the more I consider this treaty the more I am convinced that the only safe way for us to deal with it is to decline to be a party to it at all. I think we should renounce in favor of Germany any and all claims for indemnity because of the war and see that she gets credit for what we renounce, as indeed she should for the value of all she gives up as against a fixed and ample indemnity. I agree with the President when he says the indemnity should have been a fixed amount. We ought to renounce all participation or membership in commissions, committees, boards, or otherwise provided for in the treaty in aid of its execution to which by its terms we are parties. We ought not to accept cessions of German territory. We ought to declare a general policy to regard with concern any threat of disturbance of general world peace, but at the same time we should reserve complete liberty of action either independently or in conjunction with other powers in taking such steps as we determine wise for preserving the peace. We ought, then, to carry out the spirit of the act of 1916, which authorized the President to convene the nations of the world together to establish a code of international law, reduce armaments, to establish an international tribunal and go as far as possible in the direction of securing peace through justice, through a league to which all the world are parties in its formation. This would be a fitting, generous, and dignified exit from a situation in which primarily we had no direct concern.

It is indeed a hard and cruel peace that this treaty stipulates, and I have no objections to its being so, but see no reason why we, who do not partake in its spoils, should become parties to its harshness and cruelty. I see no reason why we should be parties to imposing upon Germany a treaty whose terms, our negotiators say, she will not be able to meet; a treaty that robs our ancient friend, China, in a way disapproved by our negotiators; a treaty that lays the foundation for centuries of bloodletting, into which we should not be drawn; a treaty that, contrary to our own judgment, fails to fix the amount of indemnity to be paid, leaving that vast question to the whim of a majority of a commission on reparations; a treaty predicated upon the assertion that a stricken and helpless world requires our counsel and support but leaves to the beneficiaries the decision as to the measure and character of the benefactions they are to receive; a treaty that with ominous words presages our involvement in the eruptions of suppressed volcanic world conditions; a treaty that would require us to underwrite all the regional understandings between nations recognized by the league, most of which are based upon oppression of weaker nations, many of which are as yet secret and undisclosed, and when disclosed might drive us to acts of injustice similar to that in which the President felt himself compelled to acquiesce in the case of Shantung.

The mind stands appalled and refuses to grasp the infinite possibilities which arise from the ramifications of the obligations we are asked to assume. Looking at the treaty as a whole, is it to be wondered at that we are asked to guarantee by our arms and our resources the territorial status which it creates?

Sir, I have all but finished. I have not sought to propound or establish any thesis beyond this: The treaty as it stands can not be enforced. This is admitted by its proponents. The treaty as it stands is but a harbinger of other and greater wars. This being true, the question must come, Why was this treaty so drawn and the vanquished compelled to sign it? It may be when we get all the documents this will appear. And yet in spite of all these great duties and obligations we assume for the future, in spite of our great contribution in men and resources to the successful fruition of the great joint enterprise we entered, it seems to be proposed that we are to waive all participation in the benefits of this treaty, and that we are to add further to the general burdens of the people by ourselves compensating our citizens who have suffered losses in this war.

The weight of the task resting upon us is not light, but the people demand that we fully perform it, in accordance with our sworn duty. We can in this matter take the ipse dixit of no man.

I have sought in my remarks to put before the people as tersely as I could the salient features of this treaty so that, knowing them, their counsel might assist us in our work. For one of the great defects thus far incident to the treaty is that too few minds have functioned on its provisions, and perusing it one finds it impossible to believe that any responsible mind had sought to coordinate its provisions and trace out their ultimate logical conclusions.

Nothing in all our history, sir, has called for a clearer perception of present and future, a keener or juster understanding of our free institutions, a clearer vision of the mighty mission of our great Nation in the world, or the dedication of a purer and loftier patriotism than the consideration of this treaty.

Unless, sir, we shall have the guidance of the infinite wisdom we shall fail in our duty, and, wrecking our beloved country, earn the odium of its treasonable betrayal. [Applause in the galleries.]

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a resolution adopted by Lincoln Post, No. 40, Grand Army of the Republic, of Shawnee, Okla. It is very brief, and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

SHAWNEE, OKLA., August 22, 1919.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
Senate, Washington, D. C:

At a meeting of Lincoln Post, No. 40, Grand Army of the Republic, held August 21, 1919, at Shawnee, Okla., the following resolution was unanimously adopted: Requesting the Senate of the United States do not ratify the league of nations. For we believe it to be unpatriotic in regard to article No. 10, also in regard to the Monroe doctrine, also in regard to the steal of Shantung from China. We believe we paid the great debt we did owe France, and as France came to our relief when we badly needed help so did we go to her relief when her national salvation would have been wiped off the face of the earth; we now break even.

We do not know what is in the future, but this we do know, that the United States of America has always stood for the right without coercion, and we believe that the United States has not and will not forget our moral and legal obligations no more in the future than we have in the past. We acknowledge God in our Nation, and that is more than the league of nations does. We have shed our blood that our country might live and are not willing to boost anyone's egotism or ideals to the detriment of our Nation. We do not want to see Old Glory trailed in the dust. We stand with late Col. Roosevelt for a pure and undefiled Americanism.

Respectfully, yours,

F. A. BROWN, Commander.
A. M. CALDWELL, Sergeant Major.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Peabody, Mass., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan of railroad control, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce, Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against Government ownership of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Lithuanian Citizens' Association of Boston, Mass., and a petition of Local Branch, No. 7, Lithuania National League of America, of South Boston, Mass., praying for the independence of Lithuania, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a petition of sundry postal clerks and letter carriers of Hot Springs, Ark., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

GENERAL OF THE ARMIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 163) thereon. I give notice that on Tuesday next I shall call up the bill for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 2901) for the relief of John B. O'Sullivan; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SIMMONS:

A bill (S. 2902) to amend section 5182, Revised Statutes of the United States; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 2903) to provide that robbery of a Federal reserve bank or member bank shall constitute a felony, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARRIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALSH of Montana:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 96) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Veterans Welfare Commission of the American Legion of the State of Montana sundry equipment for the use of said organization at their reunion at Helena, Mont.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

Mr. HARDING. I send to the desk a concurrent resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 8) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint special committee, consisting of two Senators and four Representatives, appointed to confer with officials of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or any political subdivision thereof, or with officers of any organization or society, or with individuals, relative to the contemplated observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, ordered to report its recommendations on or before September 1, 1919, be granted an extension of time for its report and recommendations until December 10, 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I think no explanation of the concurrent resolution is necessary. The original concurrent resolution fixed September 1 as the time for the committee to report. The officials of Massachusetts are not yet ready, and this resolution simply grants an extension of the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the resolution.

The resolution was concurred in.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at some convenient hour on Tuesday next it is my purpose to make some remarks upon the pending treaty.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall address the Senate on "The league of nations" to-morrow morning at the reassembling of the Senate at 11 o'clock, or as soon thereafter as the business of the Senate will permit.

TREATY WITH POLAND (S. DOC. NO. 82)—MILITARY OCCUPATION OF THE RHINE (S. DOC. NO. 81).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to announce that he has received from the President of the United States a message transmitting the treaty with Poland and the agreement with reference to the military occupation of the territories of the Rhine, which must be received either in open session or in executive session.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that, as in open executive session, the two documents transmitted by the President be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Secretary will read the message of the President of the United States.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, with a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to their ratification, the accompanying treaty with Poland, signed at Versailles on the 28th of June; and the agreement between the United States, Belgium, the British Empire, and France of the one part, and Germany of the other part, with regard to the military occupation of the territories of the Rhine, also signed at Versailles on the 28th of June.

This treaty and this convention are ancillary to the treaty of peace with Germany, and I am glad to lay them before the Senate now in order that they may be considered, if possible, in connection with that treaty, and also in order that they may serve to throw further light upon the treaty itself.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
29 August, 1919.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I only desire to say that those treaties have been sent in response to a request of the Committee on Foreign Relations. They were signed on the same day as the treaty of Versailles and are an integral part of the treaty with Germany.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Chair understands that an order has been made that the message and accompanying papers be printed and that they be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. That order has been made, and an order also has been made to print the treaties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, respectively, shall be named for the purpose of making arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War. That said committee shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives such program and procedure therefor as in its opinion shall be fitting and appropriate.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The resolution was concurred in.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understood that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] would continue his remarks upon the leasing bill this morning; but he is out of the Chamber for the moment. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. On page 31, line 17, I move to strike out the word "any" and to insert the word "all." I will state that the word "all" was agreed to by the committee, but in the printing of the bill the error was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, line 17, before the word "moneys," it is proposed to strike out the word "any" and to insert the word "all," so as to read:

That all moneys which may accrue to the United States.

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I notice on page 29, line 13, the word "monopoly" is incorrectly spelled. I believe that the Secretary was instructed to correct errors due to a misprint. If not, I ask that it be done now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that the engrossing clerk has a right to spell correctly if the Printing Office can not.

CONFERENCE OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there seems to be a lull in the consideration of the oil-leasing bill, and I wish to take advantage of the opportunity to call attention to a joint resolution which I introduced on the 17th of last June, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. The joint resolution proposes to authorize the President to call a conference of representatives of employees and employers. It is very brief, and I will read the substantive part of it, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to call a national conference to meet at such point as may be designated by him at an early date to be named by him, to be composed of the following-named persons, the same being among the most prominent representatives both of employers and of employees, of capital and labor: E. H. Gary, William H. Johnston, Frank P. Walsh, Charles E. Hughes, A. B. Garretson, William K. Vanderbilt, Franklin K. Lane, William B. Wilson, John D. Rockefeller, Samuel Gompers, Daniel Guggenheim, Charles H. Moyer, J. P. Morgan, Andrew Furuseth, F. S. Peabody, Frank J. Hayes, J. Ogden Armour, J. Fitzpatrick, E. L. Stotesbury, W. D. Mahon, and such other persons as the President may name, equally divided among leading representatives of labor and capital.

It shall be the duty of said conference to consider, with a view of the permanent solution of the same, such problems as may be presented to it relating to permanent relations of capital, of labor, of industrial management, of adjustment of wages, of settlement of industrial disputes, of promoting improved conditions, and greater industrial efficiency as a Nation; to adopt resolutions which, when approved by a majority of the conference composed of the representatives of capital and of labor, shall serve as recommendations to employers and employees for the government of their relations with each other; and said conference shall consider the question of State and National legislation which may be practicable and feasible, looking toward the beneficial conduct of the Nation's industries and the promotion of the welfare of all its citizens.

Mr. President, the purpose of this joint resolution was, by authoritative action of the Government, to afford an opportunity and a vehicle by which there could be an understanding between the employees of the industries of the country and the owners and operators of those industries as to the viewpoints of each. It is a matter of elementary knowledge that acquaintance and information of those who are engaged in business with each other tends to avoid troubles and disputes, tends to remove antagonism and to bring about understanding. A meeting upon an authoritative basis of national scope, with the right kind of delegates, representing the various industries of the country and the organized and unorganized employees, might very well produce a settlement on a permanent basis of some of the causes of controversy which are now menacing the peace and the order and the well-being of the entire country.

I call attention to this because the committee has taken no action on it, to emphasize the peculiar need of action of this kind at this particular time, in view of the developments that have occurred since the resolution was introduced.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I want to say to the Senator that it seems to be a very difficult matter to get a quorum of the Committe on Education and Labor; why, I do not know. The Senator's joint resolution has been up before the committee, as he knows. We now have arranged with the House Committee on Labor for a joint hearing next Thursday on the Senator's joint resolution and on the other resolutions that have been introduced in the House, and I earnestly hope that at that time some action will be taken looking toward the proposition that the Senator has advanced. The chief objection I found in the committee was in the naming of the delegates to such a conference in the joint resolution, and I think there is very substantial legitimate objection to that feature; but I firmly believe that some resolution along those lines will come out of the meeting of the joint committee, and the joint committee has the advantage of being able to secure a quorum.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad, indeed, to hear the statement of the chairman of the committee that some arrangements have been made for the serious consideration of the question.

Mr. President, the resolution that was pending in the House, or at least one of the resolutions which the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, has referred to, is simply a duplicate of this joint resolution. In fact, it is this joint resolution which was introduced there either simultaneously or subsequently to its introduction in the Senate. The introduction of this resolution has already served one purpose, with a very interesting result—that it has developed the fact that both the representatives of organized labor and the representatives of organized industry do not want to confer with each other, furnishing a new and a stronger reason than existed before why the Government ought to take some action to bring about a conference. When that sort of obstinacy exists, when that sort of estrangement exists between the parties to a controversy in which the public has a primary interest, it is a reason for the Government to take some steps toward bringing them together.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator perhaps knows that I take a very active interest in the work of the Committee on Education and Labor, having been chairman of the committee until the change occurred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I know the Senator does.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wanted to say to the Senator, in addition to what was said by the chairman of the committee, that he and I were each very favorable to such a joint resolution, provided we could get a basis of selection. We had at once earnest protests against those suggested in the joint resolution. Then we asked for suggestions as to how they should be selected. We had such a strong expression of contrary views as to the mode of selection that we hardly knew how to proceed.

I was not impressed with the idea that the men coming before us objected to a conference, but each bunch wanted to control their side of the conferees. I thought they were probably willing to confer if those before us would represent the branch of their side that would name the men that would do the conferring. It was more a difficulty about agreeing upon any plan to select conferees than any objection to coming together; at least, it so impressed me; but, at any rate, the chairman of the committee and I were not able to get anywhere with those who came before us looking toward a mode of selecting the conferees. It was suggested that the President appoint them. Quite a number of objections were expressed to that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if we can not proceed now with the oil-leasing bill?

Mr. POINDEXTER. We can not proceed with the oil-leasing bill until I get through with this matter, which is of more immediate importance than the oil-leasing bill. The Senator will save time by allowing me to proceed. It will only take a few moments.

With regard to the particular phase of this matter that the Senator from Georgia speaks of, I will say that I was present at one meeting of the committee. I appreciate the general condition to which the Senator from Iowa refers, the difficulty of getting a quorum of the committee; but that is not any reason why important questions of this kind should not be disposed of. If the members of a committee of the Senate refuse to attend and make a quorum to dispose of business which is of vital interest to the country, the chairman of the committee or some member of the committee who is interested in it ought to report that matter to the Senate, and some action ought to be taken by the Senate upon which progress could be made.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. KENYON. What does the Senator suggest as a remedy for this situation? At a meeting of this committee Thursday to take up the educational bill the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who is generally present, and myself were the only ones in attendance. Would the Senator report to the Senate the names of those who will not attend, with a motion to discharge them from the committee?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not desire to offer suggestions to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I want suggestions, because I have thought seriously, as far as I am concerned, of resigning from the chairmanship of the committee because the members will not attend. There are no more important subjects before Congress than are now before the Committee on Education and Labor, and I should like a remedy for the condition that exists.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think there is a more important committee of the Senate in this particular juncture than the committee of which the Senator from Iowa is chairman, and I should hesitate to offer suggestions to the experienced chairman of the committee. Of course, there are many courses which might be pursued.

Mr. KENYON. I will say, as far as I am concerned, that if we are going to keep on as we have been, with the members refusing to attend the meetings of the committee, I shall resign as chairman of it. We have much important legislation before us—the minimum-wage bill, the educational bill, the Americanization bill, the bill establishing a permanent bureau of labor—and I do not propose to be chairman of a committee and not have the members attend at all.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to say a word?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I hope we may have a confession from all the members of the committee who do not attend.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, this is not a confession; this is an explanation.

I have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Education and Labor. I have been profoundly grieved to think that my other duties did not permit of my attendance at the important meetings of the Committee on Education and Labor, and I think the Senator from Iowa has been apprised of the reasons of my failure to be in attendance. I hope he will not carry into execution his threat to resign from the chairmanship of the committee, and that he will still continue to be a member, and that he will appreciate the duties devolving on other members of that committee.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. The experience to which the Senator from Iowa refers does not pertain alone to his committee, but my experience is that it pertains to other committees; and we have been obliged on two committees of which I am a member—very large committees, with 17 or 18 members—to adopt a resolution that six members of the committee shall constitute a quorum to do business. Without such a resolution we would have been unable in several instances to do any business at all. I can not see any remedy except for Senators who can not attend committees, who never attend them, to resign and let men go on the committee who will attend to the work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have served on a committee with the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, and I know the diligence with which he attends sessions, the inspiration that he gives the members of committees of which he is chairman, and the example that he sets them for attendance on their sessions; and I only wish that they had imitated his example to a greater degree than they have. I certainly hope the Senator from Iowa will abandon the idea of resigning the chairmanship of the committee he refers to, because I know the interest that he takes in this important legislation which is pending before his committee, and the efforts which he has made to secure the attendance of the members.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I say another word? There were men in the Senate who were anxious to go on this committee, men who would take an especial interest in questions of human welfare, like the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], I may mention. I asked the committee on committees to place the Senator from Maryland on there. The committee, I think, when we get down to the facts of the matter, was regarded as getting too radical. They were afraid of getting too many radical men on the committee—men who take a viewpoint of these labor questions that perhaps did not agree with some of the most conservative elements of the Senate; and I am not reflecting on any men on the committee, of course. They are all good men, but many of them have not that interest in these affairs that the Senator has and that I have, and they do not regard this committee as being of any importance, and many of them do not care anything about the labor question. That is just telling the truth about it as I understand it; and so, if it goes on, they can have the whole committee as far as I am concerned.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think one remedy would be afforded if the chairman, after a sufficient number of efforts to secure the attendance of a quorum of a committee, would make a report on his own account to the Senate, reporting back the legislation which is pending in the committee, stating the circumstances which prevent the committee from acting upon it, and asking the Senate for advice upon that legislation and as to the disposition of it. That would tend to bring the matter before the Senate and before the country, and undoubtedly remedies could be found. I think this discussion probably will have some beneficial effect upon the attendance on committees.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is it not a fact that Senators are on altogether too many different committees? Every Senator is on six or seven committees.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is one of the vices of the situation, although I do not know that it is the cause of the difficulty we are discussing, because I notice that the remarks apply to Senators who are on few committees as well as to those who are on many. But I think the situation the Senator mentions does exist, and perhaps it ought to be corrected.

I was present, Mr. President, in attendance on the Committee on Education and Labor in an effort to get action upon this joint resolution at a hearing that had been called by the chairman. The general counsel of the American Federation of Labor—I am very sorry to say that I believe that he is since deceased—an able lawyer, and authorized to represent that organization, appeared before the committee and made an address to the committee or those members of it who were present; and he did not, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, merely base his objection upon the names that were mentioned as members of this proposed conference. He did object to them; but he also expressly and emphatically objected to any conference at all. I remember very distinctly that he argued there rather strenuously, I thought, that this savored of the shifting of responsibility on the part of Congress; that Congress is the legislative body of the country that ought to make rules in regard to the relations of labor and employers, overlooking altogether that the purpose of the resolution was to bring about such an adjustment of the differences as would in many cases obviate the necessity of legislation, which is always objectionable if these industrial disputes can be settled privately and without the interference of the Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia rose.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Furthermore, let me add—and then I will yield in a moment to the Senator from Georgia—there seemed to be a very fundamental misapprehension on the part both of the representatives of organized labor and the representatives of organized industry in regard to the purposes of the proposition.

Both of them seem to think that it was introduced merely as affecting them. Neither one could see that there was any other interest in the matter except their own. Neither one could see that the opposite party had as much right to be consulted about the initiation of legislation, the form of the legislation, and the names of the conferees as they had; and still less did they appreciate the fact that over and above the interest of them both, far more extensive and more vital, and far more entitled to the consideration of Congress than the particular interest either of industry or of labor, were the interests of the great public of the United States. It is in the interest of the public, including labor, including industry and its owners and operatives, in order to avoid disaster, loss, injury, suffering, perhaps death, that may come from the threatened movements and controversies that are now approaching a critical stage in the country, that I have introduced this resolution—not thinking that it would be a panacea or that it would surely result in improving conditions, but that it might result in settling some of the controversies; that there was everything to gain and nothing to lose.

I received a telegram from the President of the American Federation of Labor expressing some resentment that the joint resolution was introduced without consulting him, a very naive expression, perfectly natural, apparently an unconscious expression of the idea that seems to be prevalent in certain ranks that nothing which affects them can be done without their consent, overlooking the fact that they are a part of the public, and that the public interest is paramount, and that the Government rules over all.

I also received a letter from the president of the Wage Adjustment Board, indicating another rather peculiar viewpoint of certain elements as to the direction and method that ought to be pursued in the consideration of these questions of labor and capital by the Congress of the country. He said that nothing ought to be done until the President came home. I wrote him that I knew that that idea represented a considerable element of opinion in the country of persons who thought that nothing ought to be done without first consulting with the President, but that I did not think it was the predominant opinion of the country. The President, of course, is entitled to the highest consideration in these matters, but it is not necessary and it was not necessary, before exercising the functions of Congress upon a matter that is more or less critical, to postpone all consideration of it until the President could return from his long sojourn in Paris.

On the other hand, I received a number of letters from manufacturers, evidently part of a propaganda, evidently worked up by their organization through the officials whom they maintain here in Washington City, also expressing resentment that such a thing as this should be done without first consulting with them, and objecting to the names that were proposed for the members of the conference, and many of them objecting altogether to the idea of a conference between labor and capital at all. The joint resolution provides that in addition to the names which are mentioned as members of the conference the President may appoint additional conferees. There is no limit placed upon the number, so that there is every opportunity, in case the resolution should pass, even in the form in which it was introduced, for the President to direct the complexion and character of the conference and to see that every interest which claimed to have a right to be represented there had a delegate in the conference. Many of these manufacturers said that there was no one in this list of names in the resolution who really represented the employers. There is Mr. E. H. Gary, whose name is mentioned; there is Mr. J. Ogden Armour, whose name is mentioned; there is Mr. Daniel Guggenheim, whose name is mentioned; and Mr. J. P. Morgan; and there are names of others mentioned who represent the banking interests in the country and what might be called capital. It seems to me that those whom I particularly mention certainly can be said to represent the employers of the country, because they are the heads of active industrial organizations.

Mr. Guggenheim, for instance, is one of the largest employers in the United States. He is one of the heads of the great smelting interests of the country, who employ thousands of men. If he is not in immediate contact with the employees it would be to his interest and he would have every means and opportunity of surrounding himself with men as his advisers who are in the employ of the corporations of which he is one of the controllers and who are in direct contact with employees in the smelting plants. Mr. Armour likewise is a representative of the employers of the country, and so is Mr. Gary. Only a few days ago I noticed that the representatives of the American Federation of Labor were seeking to obtain a conference with Mr. Gary, although it is only a short time since they opposed the resolution which named him as a member of a general national conference for the consideration of the general labor situation throughout the country. This indicates the inconsistency of the attitude, the narrowness of the viewpoint of both sides to the controversy, the fact that both, I think, are disposed—instead of assuming a helpful attitude to bring about an agreement upon mooted questions, to search out remedies, to avoid the loss and suffering which occur from industrial warfare—to put petty obstacles in the way, to create difficulties and objections where there is no substantial ground for them. All of which emphasizes the fact that Congress itself must use its own judgment in these matters and not wait upon the agreement of these special parties as a preliminary condition to the passage of the legislation.

I wish to present and ask to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a telegram received from Mr. D. M. Linnard, a prominent and patriotic citizen of San Francisco, Calif., in relation to the resolution, and to express the hope that the committee, in the meeting with the committee of the House to which the chairman has referred, will take some definite action upon this important matter. It can not be productive of any harm; it may be productive of beneficial results.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 25, 1919.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Congratulations upon your labor-capital resolution. Every thoughtful, well-meaning citizen, with sincere desire for solution of our people's most serious problem, will undoubtedly applaud and aid the suggested conference, with heartfelt hope for results which will tend to a better understanding between capital and labor, employees and employers. The time has actually arrived for the cooperation of broad-minded, fair-minded, liberal men from the ranks of labor and the like of capital, who will reason fairly for all, make concessions where just, and save our people from the fearful results which would be disgraceful to the intelligence we Americans credit ourselves with possessing. As an extensive employer in my 10 hotels, including the Palace in San Francisco, the Ambassador at Atlantic City, I commend action on your resolution, and hope for most successful results with but little delay. If my sentiments as expressed herein indicate my ability to be of assistance to you in this splendid cause, please command me.

D. M. LINNARD.

LUDENDORFF'S STORY OF THE WAR.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I received yesterday afternoon a telegram from a distinguished citizen of my State, one who proved himself a patriot and was active in all efforts to assist our cause during the late war. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read, and I then desire to make a few comments on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., August 26, 1919.

Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

To-day's Oregonian announces the Ludendorff story of the war will not be printed in the Oregonian. Everyone I know here says the patriotic decision of the Oregonian is right, and that the Federal Government should forbid at once the publication of the Ludendorff story in every paper of the United States. Why should our dead and maimed soldiers' homes be profaned with Ludendorff's story vindicating Hun brutalities?

L. B. SEELEY.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the paper referred to and I think a great many other papers in the United States have been carrying for a number of insertions the promise that Ludendorff's story of the war would at a certain date in the future—probably some time the next week—be printed in that and the other papers which have carried the announcement.

I am in accord with the views of Mr. Seeley, who sends that telegram, to a certain extent, and while I would not undertake to restrain the press from publishing this story, if they see fit to do so, yet I would appeal to the patriotism of the newspapers in the United States and beg them, as Congress ought to beg them, not to publish this story of the war.

My reason for it can be found in the character of the man who writes the story. While I have not had an opportunity to look up the record of Ludendorff as he is and was during the war, I desire to quote a brief statement with reference to the man from Current Opinion of August, 1918, entitled:

French interpretation of Gen. Erich Ludendorff—Latest effort to disclose the real man behind the mask.

The article is quite lengthy, and I satisfy myself with reading just the concluding paragraph, but I am going to ask that the whole article be printed in connection with the telegram. The article, taken as a whole, is rather favorable to Ludendorff as a man of great ability and a man who rose rapidly in his profession of arms. It shows the viewpoint of a Frenchman, though rather an impartial observer of the man. It concludes:

The character of Ludendorff is pronounced by the French observer to be "hard, cruel, pitiless," in accordance with the dominant ideal of the Prussians in high command. Ludendorff, we are assured, was the most ferocious instigator of continued submarine warfare. He insists upon constant aerial bombardment of open and unfortified towns.

Remember, Mr. President, this was in the midst of the war. Now, quoting:

"By killing the women and children," he is quoted as saying, "we destroy the future mothers and the ultimate defenders of their land; that is, the future forces upon which the enemy depends."

That is the end of the quotation of Lundendorff's observation.

Ludendorff, moreover, is a hypocrite, a sly and affected being. He is not above telling the newspapers that the lives of German soldiers are more precious than a mere swamp or a blackened ruin the enemy wants to preserve. He is notoriously the most sanguinary feeder of cannon with "fodder," never hesitating to pile high the plains of the Somme with heaps of German dead. Ludendorff attaches great importance to what he calls "morale," and no press agent had ever more skill.

I call attention to this because it reflects that he is active in America, as he was active over there, with press agents.

He keeps in touch with the journalists night and day, for it is a mistake to deem him the "simple soldier," at his ease only in the theater of war. He holds his regular receptions for the benefit of his friends, the reporters. He inspires a school of military criticism with its experts to prove that Germany is invincible. He is a master of the propaganda that works with fiction. He invented the system of heralding every German offensive far in advance, arguing that the effect upon enemy "morale" is tremendous.

Ludendorff is a commander who seeks less a strategical surprise than a tactical one. An organizer of experience and ability, he excels in preparation. His plans are not only large, but definite. He concentrates. He affects a complete candor with the enemy, advertising an offensive that remains in detail a secret, announced with menaces and shrouded with devices that bewilder, distract, terrify, the inexperienced.

Now, Mr. President, that is the character of the man. Can it be that his propaganda is to be disseminated in the United States through the instrumentality of a so-called history of the war or story of the war? Are the American people to be educated from the German standpoint and to have the German theory of the reason for the war, Germany's innocence in its instigation, its harmless carrying on of the war, through the instrumentality of the story of this man?

Mr. LODGE. Is it proposed to publish serially or in any other way such a thing as that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely. If the Senator will observe some of the newspapers he will find that they are promising now to publish in the near future the so-called Ludendorff Story of the War.

Mr. LODGE. I trust it will not be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am just expressing that hope, and I am glad to have the Senator join with me.

This article goes on to say that it was Ludendorff who brought Hindenburg to the front, and not Hindenburg who brought Ludendorff to the front; that it was Ludendorff whose brains were the animation and spirit of the German Army during its whole progress. As this paper says, he has been responsible, therefore, for the ruthless submarine warfare. He has gloried in the bombing of adjoining territory, the destruction of women and children who were not participants in the war.

Mr. President, America has had over 200,000 casualties as a result of the war. Not only are her hospitals filled with boys who have been maimed by the cruel processes of German warfare, but the asylums as well are filled in some instances with young men who were shell-shocked or otherwise disabled by the system of warfare waged under Ludendorff's direction. The American people have learned who are the authors of this war. They know it was the settled plan of the militarists of Germany to become involved in it and to wage it. They know that it was their purpose in the last analysis to make America assist in the payment for the war, if current and contemporaneous history is to be believed. Notwithstanding that belief and knowledge, are we to have this friend of the reportorial system of Europe introduce his methods into this country and slyly instill into the American people not only that Germany was innocent of instituting the war but that the German methods were kindly and its purposes lofty?

I for one, Mr. President, hope that the newspapers of the country, and I am glad to say that practically all of them were patriotic and loyal in the war, will without any action upon the part of Congress, but simply inspired by the same motives of patriotism which animated them during the war, decline absolutely to print this story of the war by the man who was the reputed military leader and who is so largely responsible for German cruelty and brutality.

I call attention of the Congress to this matter, Mr. President, in the hope that, if this story is to be printed, there may be some public expression about the author of this so-called history of the war, so that the people may be warned in advance to read it with caution as a part of a system of German propaganda, deliberately planned to poison the minds of the American people, and of the fathers and mothers, wives and sweethearts of our heroic dead.

There being no objection, the article from Current Opinion for August, 1918, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"FRENCH INTERPRETATION OF GEN. ERICH LUDENDORFF—LATEST EFFORT TO DISCLOSE THE REAL MAN BEHIND THE MASK.

"Physically one's first impression of Ludendorff is that of a vast forehead, very rounded, very well denuded of hair, above eyes of the profoundest blue, that search keenly. A blond mustache is traced definitely, along with the thin lips, disdainfully curved. The chin inclines to the double formation. The head as a whole seems to reflect lively intelligence, an obvious mentality contrasting with trooper Hindenburg's heavy mass and ponderous look. Ludendorff's corpulence is great enough, considering his medium height, yet he conveys an impression of the energetic man, sure of himself, in full physical and intellectual vigor. The portrait is sketched in the Paris Illustration by Commandant Henru Carre, who knows Ludendorff and who has done perhaps one of the best of the many sketches now taking up so much space in the French press. Is he a genius? The question is of critical importance, suggests the Debats, considering the importance attached to the quality not by Napoleon only but by all who have written on the art of war. Commandant Carre reaches the conclusion that Ludendorff is no better, to say the least, than Foch, and the German has yet to display the artistry of the Frenchman, the art of war being as important as the science. Nevertheless, reckoning with the danger of underestimating the enemy, if pains be taken to take the true measure of Ludendorff, the idea of him is, the French commandant says, that of a man brilliant as regards intelligence, indefatigable by nature, endowed with a most supple mind. He is rich in the expedients devised on the spur of the moment—a quality precious to von Moltke—and he has liveliness of imagination. The brain is, in a word, rich in ideas. Ludendorff is, accordingly, a great soldier because he reveals imagination and ideas. All his qualities are reinforced, fortified, accentuated by cool energy, a tenacious will, and a strong soul.

"Ludendorff is, as German commanders go, young, and his career in Berlin passes for rapid and even brilliant. He is not much past 50, for he was born in Krucszevina, in the Province of Posen, April 9, 1865, his rise having been so meteoric that the ordinary reference book even in Germany fails to note the fact. Erich Ludendorff had the good luck to possess a far-seeing and a wealthy parent of Prussian stock, who got him, at 17, into the Ploen cadet school, from which he emerged as a sublieutenant in an infantry regiment at Wesel. The young man turned up as a lieutenant of marines at Kiel and then got into the grenadiers. His ambitions were always military and they took him to the war academy which sent him forth with the rank of captain at 30. How he got into the great general staff at Berlin, in view of his comparatively mediocre origin, is not clear, but he went out of it and through the grades successfully. He proved himself an officer of the correct general staff type, bred in the true Moltke school, and a creditable pupil of Gen. von Schlieffen.

"Ludendorff was early established as a military scientist, with rare gifts for the assimilation of whatever knowledge came his way. When he was 47 he took command of the fusiliers at Dusseldorf and not long after he was at Strassburg as major general of infantry. This was the force with which he went into the grand mobilization for the war, and he replaced, as head of the fourteenth brigade, Gen. von Vassoff, who was killed at Liege. In the course of the swift operations which reduced that place the brilliant behavior of Ludendorff, who led the assault at the head of his brigade, earned for him one of the first of the crosses of a knight of the Order 'Pour le Merite,' of which Emperor William is so sparing.

"Now occurred in the career of Ludendorff the 'decisive event,' of which so much has been written. The general staff had become worried at the advance of the Russian forces into German territory. It was Ludendorff, however, who suggested Hindenburg, and not Hindenburg who suggested Ludendorff. The aged man was intimately acquainted with the theater of operations in East Prussia. Ludendorff's reputation for sound judgment was so solid that the all highest took the risk of heeding his suggestion. Hindenburg was dragged from his retirement at Hanover, and naturally he selected Ludendorff as his chief of staff. These are the facts, declares our French authority, in spite of many a tale to the contrary. In no long time the pair won the Tannenburg victory, which brought to one the grade of field marshal and to the other that of lieutenant general. At the head of a group of armies they gained the day at the Mazurian Lakes, and, specializing in the Russian theater of operations, they redeemed their native land from pressing perils with the conquest of Poland and Galicia. Just two years ago, in consequence of the Bronsiloff offensive, 'which caused the German defense to tremble to its foundation,' Hindenburg, still 'doubled' with Ludendorff, was given command of the Austro-German forces in the eastern theater. Before many days—replacing Von Falkenhayn, who had to take all the blame for the Verdun check—Hindenburg was made chief of the general staff, with Ludendorff at his right hand as general of infantry, exercising the functions of a chief general quartermaster. 'They ticked like two clocks.'

"The whole German press was jubilant. 'An immense delight reigns everywhere in the fatherland. Our new Blucher retains at his side our new Gneisenau. Ludendorff remains with Hindenburg.' The Kaiser consented to the eclipse of his own imperial star by the new constellation of the twins, Hindenburg-Ludendorff, and the field marshal in turn—free from jealousy or full of gratitude—permitted the personality of his right-hand man to grow more decisive and conspicuous. On the western front, until the beginning of the present offensive, the great idea of the two chiefs seem to the French expert we quote to have been the strategical retirement to that well-known Hindenburg line. The operation was presented at home as 'a bit of boldness conceived by the highest genius' and as 'a prelude to the solutions entirely new and magnificent.' In spite of these enthusiasms, the great general staff took refuge in a strict defensive for the period of one whole year, during which it sustained the successive checks of Arras, Ypres, Vimy, the Chemin des Dames, Verdun, and l'Allette. Ludendorff concentrated all his faculties on the collapse of Russia before turning again to the 'principal enemy,' France, and the most detested of all the foes, England.

"The collaboration of Hindenburg and Ludendorff has all this time been most intimate. In this association one acts as the brain and the other as the right hand. One represents the young and active element, the fecund brain with the 'ideas,' while the other is the mass which brings the weight to bear. The decisions seem to be taken in common, but they are for the most part inspired by Ludendorff. In the 'enormous machine' called 'German war,' one is the motor and the other is the power. Ludendorff is the true directing mind. Force is affirmed by our French authority to be eminently the characteristic of the man. One detects that fact in his favorite aphorisms. 'As always in war,' he observes, 'one must now be strong and resolute. Superiority, danger—such things exist only for the feeble.' He is fond of saying also that the strong man does not talk of danger but, at most, of the way to avoid it. Again: 'He who complains of fatality had better accuse himself.' 'A strong will creates his own destiny.' Ludendorff says there is no such thing as fatality, as destiny. There is but the will of the strong man.

"The character of Ludendorff is pronounced by the French observer to be 'hard, cruel, pitiless,' in accordance with the dominant ideal of the Prussians in high command. Ludendorff, we are assured, was the most ferocious instigator of continued submarine warfare. He insists upon constant aerial bombardment of open and unfortified towns. 'By killing the women and children,' he is quoted as saying, 'we destroy the future mothers and the ultimate defenders of their land; that is, the future forces upon which the enemy depends.' LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Senate in continuation of the speech begun by him on Wednesday. After having spoken for four hours,

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me that I may ask him a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator expect to conclude this afternoon? I gave notice yesterday that I would move an executive session to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Wisconsin could go on he might conclude in half an hour.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall probably consume a couple of hours longer.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me, then, to move an executive session?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be very glad to yield, and if agreeable to the Senator from Utah, I will yield the floor for the time being.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to give notice that if the bill is not passed by 6 o'clock to-morrow evening I shall ask for a night session. The Senator from North Carolina desires an executive session, and I shall make the motion, if he does not, because I agreed to it yesterday.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the Senator from Utah move it.

Mr. OWEN. Before the motion is made I wish to say just a word.

Mr. SMOOT. I will withhold the motion.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I notice in the New York Journal of Commerce that Mr. Seward Prosser, president of the Bankers' Trust Co., made a statement to the effect that a comment which I made on the floor that the bankers had profited in large measure by the high premium paid for the purchase of American dollars or credits by British, French, and Italian importers showed a complete misunderstanding of the functions of banks in dealing in foreign exchange; that the banks act merely as brokers in exchange transactions; that they execute orders from their customers to buy or sell exchange at the market price of the moment and charge for the service a commission usually ranging from one-eighth of 1 per cent to sometimes less than one-sixteenth of 1 per cent, depending on the size and character of the transaction, which charge is included in the rate of exchange. He said:

In order that the banks might profit along the lines suggested by Senator OWEN, they would themselves have to purchase the exchange created by these commercial transactions and hold it, hoping for an improvement in the market with all its attendant risks. If operations of this kind had been the practice in the past, they would now show large losses to the banks, as is easily realized when the decline in the exchange market is considered.

Mr. President, I thoroughly understand the practice. I know one of the great trust companies charged off over $5,000,000 to losses on Russian rubles because of transactions of this very character, and I am informed and believe that these transactions of the immediate past have run into $500,000,000, and that these transactions do involve these profits by holding the foreign exchange credit until the reaction takes place, and that somebody has bought them beyond a doubt, because the transactions could not take place without that having been done. I state as a fact that certain banks and trust companies in New York City have been buying exchange and selling it short on their own account as well as for clients and customers on the scale of millions and not alone as Mr. Prosser describes, which is the legitimate method. Mr. Prosser does himself little credit by issuing a statement that every foreign exchange banker in New York should know is grossly misleading to the public. I know what is going on, and Mr. Prosser can not sidetrack the facts, but may precipitate a congressional inquiry that will expose the conditions as they are.

I want our commerce protected and intend to protect it if I can do so, in spite of all camouflage or denials by those who should know better than to deny a notorious fact.

The short selling of exchange for speculation is producing bad results, as shown by a telegram which I have just received from some of the unhappy exporters of New York, stating that the export business of the United States is being paralyzed and that if it is the desire of the Government to correct this injurious condition certain remedial steps will have to be taken. I ask that the telegram may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., August 27, 1919.

Senator ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate Offices, Washington, D. C.:

The export business of the United States is paralyzed to-day. If it is the desire of our Government to preserve to America its foreign commerce and prevent the horrors of overproduction in the near future, something must be done at once to get the Government and all interested members of the community together to provide a present remedy. If a committee is convened by call of the President in Washington, consisting, say, of two appointees of the President, two members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, two members of the appropriate House committee, two members of the bankers committee, two members of the American Manufacturers' Export Association, two exporters, and two appointees of the National Chamber of Commerce to sit in Washington, hold hearings, and bring forth a plan, a solution will be forthcoming, having the support of all, in 30 days. There is a great crisis, which will admit neither of delays nor of differences between those charged with the responsibility of averting a great misfortune. Anything we can do to help, regardless of time or expense, will be done.

GASTON, WILLIAMS & WIGMORE,
GEO. MOGENSEN.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose that telegram will confirm what I said here the other day—that our exports can not remain at the amount they are at the present time unless some kind of an arrangement is made for foreign trade.

Mr. OWEN. That is absolutely true. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] told me that the New York port is congested with ships loaded with American goods that can not go abroad because they can not be financed. The Senate ought to take some steps to meet the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. It is because foreign countries can not pay for the goods. That is the absolute truth.

Mr. OWEN. A dispatch from Boston announces the organization of a credit corporation with $100,000,000 capital, one-half to be furnished by Americans and one-half by Italians. The Italian Government to be asked to guarantee 5 per cent to 7 per cent on the stock and to guarantee credits up to $500,000,000 backed by bonds at 50 cents on the dollar.

A dispatch from London states that Sir Auckland Geddes, in the House of Commons, stated that the British Government would set up an office to provide sterling credits on behalf of European countries where insufficient facilities are available through ordinary channels. That the London Times says the plan will greatly benefit the financial and mercantile communities. England acts and Congress talks and does not provide relief.

The negotiations in New York for raising of credits for France, Italy, and Belgium are said to total nearly a billion dollars, according to the same London dispatch. Fair terms must be provided or these shipments can not be made.

I insert a dispatch from Paris showing that France is taking steps to put her financial house in good order and justifying the faith of those who have entire confidence in the solvency of this great people.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TO CONSOLIDATE FRENCH DEBTS—BILL WILL TAKE CARE OF FLOATING OBLIGATIONS—MINISTER OF FINANCE PLANS TO RAISE LARGE SUMS FOR RAILWAYS AND FOR LIBERATED DISTRICTS OF FRANCE.

PARIS, August 5.

Now that the importance of the peace conference has been lessened, the Government has decided to take stringent measures with a view of reducing the cost of living and of making it possible for France to develop a healthy industrial life. With this object a special economic council has been formed under the presidency of M. Clemenceau. It includes among its members M. Klotz, the minister of finance; M. Claveille, the minister of transport; M. Loucheur, the minister of industry; M. Clementel, minister of commerce; M. Noulens, minister of agriculture; M. Henry Simon, minister of colonies; M. Colliard, minister of labor; and M. Lebrun, minister of the liberated regions.

The council held a formal meeting, and the public has already shown the necessity of some such stringent action by having taken the law on several occasions into its own hands. Both in Paris and the Provinces shops where unduly high prices have been charged have been sacked, and the public authorities have scarcely interfered. This so far has not occurred on a large scale, but it is indicative of public irritation. One of the methods on which M. Noulens is particularly relying to prevent abuse is the posting up of retail and wholesale prices, so that the public will be in a position to appreciate whether a fair profit or unfair profit is being made. One of the most important steps which has been taken to reduce the cost of living has been the purchase of American Army stocks. The price has not yet been officially stated, but it is known that the French Government will now have at its disposal a large number of railway engines and wagons, some 50,000 motor lorries and motor cars, large quantities of clothing and foods, and considerable stocks of agricultural implements and supplies of all sorts. It is expected that these supplies will be placed on the market according to the system adopted in the case of French Army stores.

M. Klotz threw some interesting light on the financial policy of the country. He estimates that some twelve milliards will be obtained during the last six months of the year through bons de la defense. Taxes during the same period will bring in some five milliards, and he expects also to make use of advances from the Banque de France. He has stated definitely his intention of raising a new loan to consolidate floating debt, but refused to indicate when the loan will be issued. He suggested that it would be undesirable to attempt an issue until there is a feeling of absolute confidence, but evidently anticipates the raising of a sum at least equal to that obtained from the last loan. He intends to raise some nine hundred million for the State railways either during the month of August or early in September. He also advocates a loan of some two and a half milliards being raised for the liberated districts, and has actually brought in a bill for bringing this into effect. M. Klotz concluded in an optimistic note, stating that the financial negotiations with the allied Governments were progressing satisfactorily.

The universal scarcity of coal has given considerable impetus to the movement in this country for the development of the French waterfalls as sources of power for industrial purposes. One of the most ardent advocates of the bill which is now before the chamber for rendering it possible to make fuller use of France's great natural resources of this kind is M. Jules Cels, the undersecretary of state for public works, who has made a special study of the question. In an interview a few days ago M. Cels stated that France, in its waterfalls and rivers, possesses power to the extent of 9,000,000 horsepower, of which only 750,000 horsepower, or less than 10 per cent, have as yet been utilized. This amount of power, M. Cels calculates, if properly organized, would correspond to a permanent productive force of 78,000,000,000 horsepower hours, which would represent annually the equivalent of the power produced by 78,000,000 tons of coal.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, August 30, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 29, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, as we pass this way but once, help us to leave in our wake some worthy thought or deed, if it be only to plant a tree or flower, dig a well, or help some forlorn soul to a higher altitude.

If there be aught of malice, revenge, or jealousy in our hearts, remove it far from us, that love and good will may grow abundantly. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will designate Mr. GOOD, of Iowa, to preside over the House on Tuesday next, in case the Speaker should not be here at the opening of the House.

A QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARD rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mudd	Sanders, N. Y.	Stephens, Ohio

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-nine Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at this moment.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask a change of reference in the case of the bill H. R. 8378 from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks that a change of reference be made of the bill H. R. 8378 from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the bill?

Mr. GARD. The bill is one which was introduced by me, and its purpose is to control necessaries through interstate commerce.

Mr. ANDERSON. Had the gentleman any agreement with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture with respect to the bill?

Mr. GARD. The chairman of the committee is over there. He said he did not want the bill in his committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from the Director General of Railroads, Mr. Hines, in which he requests me to have it printed in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD in addition to my own remarks. I ask that I may be permitted to print this letter and other comments on the industrial situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Director General of Railroads and his comments thereon. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. For the present I object until we can have a vote upon the pending bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, now I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. For the present I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business before the House is the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary additional personnel for the Army. Upon that there was one amendment. The previous question was ordered. The amendment really covered the whole bill. The Chair will not ask to have it reported. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on a motion to recommit.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. QUIN. I am. I am opposed to any increase of the personnel at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. QUIN: I move to recommit the bill——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would such a motion be in order until after the motion to recommit had been fully read by the Clerk?

The SPEAKER. No. The Clerk will report the motion in full.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. QUIN: I move to recommit the bill to the committee, with instructions to immediately report it back to the House with an amendment to strike out the words "eighteen thousand," in line 15, page 2, and insert "sixteen thousand" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. On that I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Two gentlemen have risen in the affirmative—not a sufficient number—and the yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi to recommit.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 182.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have already been refused.

Mr. QUIN. Then I make the point of no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The last vote discloses a quorum. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, upon the passage of the bill I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Five Members have risen—not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 181, noes 16.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. The vote just taken is less than a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. The vote just taken shows no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. That makes no difference. The question is whether a quorum is present or not. [After counting.] Two hundred and forty-one Members are present, a quorum. The bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. KEARNS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. KAHN, H. R. 7878, the similar House bill, was ordered to lie on the table.

THE HOUSING CORPORATION.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject does the gentleman desire to speak?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I simply want to straighten out a matter that occurred in the House the day before yesterday with respect to the Housing Corporation.

Mr. DOWELL. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object—and I shall not object in any event—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] would like to address the House for 15 minutes. I do not care to couple that with the request of the gentleman from Florida, but that request will be made.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the agreement general debate on the pending bill has not yet been closed, and I intended to yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

The SPEAKER. Can the gentleman from Florida also be accommodated?

Mr. DYER. Has not the gentleman from Florida already been given unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No; he has not.

Mr. FORDNEY. I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida.

There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, day before yesterday the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] called attention to a very glaring instance of the extravagant use of money by the United States Housing Corporation. Unfortunately I had some important business which detained me from the House or I would have been present at that time. Some questions were raised on that occasion that I think ought to be explained to the House.

Realizing the extravagance in which this bureau was indulging, on the 28th day of May last I introduced a resolution in the House providing for an exhaustive investigation of the bureau. That resolution went to the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Rules held hearings for four separate days upon it.

I think the committee was convinced, as the chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas] stated on the floor day before yesterday, that it was a very extravagant and wasteful outfit. But although that resolution has been pending since the 28th of May, the Committee on Rules, for some reason, has not reported it out. It was stated in the discussion referred to that the reason why it was not reported out was because the Senate was engaged in a like investigation, and the Committee on Rules did not care to have the work duplicated. At the time that this resolution was first pending before the Committee on Rules there was no investigation in progress in the Senate at all. I believe since that time and very recently a committee of the Senate has taken it up, and I am not going to say whether there is an investigation pending there or not. Gentlemen can investigate for themselves and can ascertain how thoroughly it is being made. The fact is, though, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which committee reported the legislation that created this institution, undertook to hedge it about with all sorts of safeguards to prevent the very thing that has occurred; and since we have not been able to get an investigation, in order to lay bare facts before this House that I think would appall the members, I introduced a bill to repeal the law under which this Housing Corporation is operating. That bill came before our Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the committee has reported it out, and it is on the calendar now, and I am extremely anxious and the entire membership of the committee are extremely anxious to get it before the House, in order that we may stop this profligate expenditure of public funds and not let it go any further. [Applause.] I may say that the chairman of the committee [Mr. LANGLEY] has been called away upon very important matters, but he will be back here Monday, and I know it is his purpose to undertake to get the Committee on Rules to give us a rule for the consideration of that bill; and we are prepared now, without any further investigation, to lay facts before this House that will show an utter disregard for the economical expenditure of the public funds on the part of this Housing Corporation. Talk about extravagance! The whole thing reeks with it from the very beginning to this good hour. In the first place, they employed an army of people. They had at one time much more than a thousand employees to build a few houses for laborers over this country, in order that we might have munitions and things of that kind manufactured to carry on the war. While the war was in progress we said nothing about it, because we knew that in the nature of things there had to be and would be great waste, but when the armistice was signed and the war had ended our committee put these gentlemen upon notice that they had to go out of business, and we called upon them to reduce their force as rapidly as possible in order to go out of business, because it never was intended that this thing should be a permanent adjunct to the Government of the United States. But their whole course has clearly indicated their purpose to fasten themselves on the Government as a permanent institution, and I am quite sure, if they are let alone, all the property which is now held by them will be dissipated in such wasteful performances as the printing of this book, constantly increasing salaries, and the like, and that it will take them not months but years to wind up their affairs.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Is it a fact that this Housing Corporation spent $128,000 for automobiles?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; that is a fact.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Is it a fact also that this Housing Corporation has increased the salaries of its employees since the close of the war?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely, and one of them from $5,000 to $9,996 a year, a good many of them doubled, and I have recently learned that they increased the salary of one man, who was styled an expert on dormitory equipment, from $5,000 to $12,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Florida be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman has just called attention to the question of salaries. Has the gentleman from Florida any information as to the salary of the librarian who prepared that publication that I showed here day before yesterday?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Hubbard? No; I did not know they had an editor until I saw that book.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that it would be within the province of the corporation whose duty it was to build houses to employ a librarian to edit a book?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Not at all; they exceeded their authority in the preparation and the printing of the book. Section 6 of the act creating the concern provided simply for a report by the President, to whom was intrusted the execution of the act, to Congress at the beginning of every session of Congress showing their financial operations, their acts and doings, how they had expended the money, what they had expended it for, whom they employed and what salaries were paid them. They have gone out of their way to get up a magnificent book on the finest paper you can find, with cuts and prints and all sorts of illustrations, without any authority whatever.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman is entirely in accord with the statement I made day before yesterday that the publication was absolutely beyond the authority of the report which the President is authorized to make to Congress.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Undoubtedly. I want to say further that this book is gotten out by the United States Housing Corporation, and the law nowhere requires a report from that corporation. The Congress did not know them until an appropriation was asked for. They got authority to incorporate so that they could use these moneys as a revolving fund and not come to Congress when they wanted money. I will say that at that time I was at home in Florida on a very important business matter, but if I had been here that provision would have gone out on a point of order, because I certainly should have raised it on the appropriation bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Did the committee make any investigation as to the cost of this report?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I never knew a thing about it until I received a copy of the book sent me through the mail or by messenger two or three days ago; but I apprehend our committee will look into that.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman contend that the publication of the book was entirely unauthorized?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Absolutely.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am surprised.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman's committee make a further investigation and report the facts to the House?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; that is my idea.

Mr. TREADWAY. One further question. May I ask the gentleman if he does not consider that the extravagance shown in the publication of the book was in accord with the extravagance shown——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All the way through.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill reported by the gentleman's committee. Does it provide for a substitute of some other system, or does it simply abolish the corporation?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It repeals the law, which will wipe out the United States Housing Corporation, and provides for turning over the property that they have accumulated to the Treasury Department to be sold by an organization which the Treasury Department already has and which will not cost the Government a single dollar to dispose of it.

On June 15, 1919, they had 238 people on the pay rolls in the Washington office to administer a dead concern, because they have no authority to build anything now, and, in fact, it seems that their principal activities now consist in raising salaries, publishing beautiful and expensive books in which to detail their exploits, and otherwise glorifying their wonderful abilities.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Would that include the building and construction by the Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; that is a separate matter. Now, let me say that since this bill has been introduced and reported to the House this bureau has become very active. They do not come to Congress themselves in order to present a justification for their further existence and their wasteful actions, but they have gone to the war workers on the Plaza, the dormitories, to the young ladies who come from all over the country, and appealed to them with the statement that this means "to turn you out in the street with no home." It does not mean anything of the sort, because we provide in the bill that the dormitories are to be turned over to the Public Buildings Commission, of which Senator SMOOT is chairman, and are to be operated as long as there is necessity for them, and it does not cost the Government any money. [Applause.]

TARIFF ON PEARL BUTTONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7705.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7705.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the morning papers carry a headline that reads as follows:

First speech in Ohio; Wilson will open his campaign for treaty next Thursday; trip to occupy 25 days.

Gentlemen, I am of the opinion now that the President is going to make his first speech in my home State. The time has come when I, as a member of the delegation from Ohio, should raise my voice within these walls and ask that the President of the United States exercise common honesty in the statement that he makes to the people of my State with reference to the league of nations.

I want Mr. Wilson when he goes to Columbus next Thursday to tell the mothers of Ohio that while he is out seeking to tie to the cannon wheels of Europe the boys of this land his Secretary of War, also from my State, is asking the Committee on Military Affairs of this House for a standing army of more than a million men—576,000 men to be ready for service and 691,000 rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed boys of the United States of America to be conscripted into training, and what for? Oh, men, I am not talking politics now. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I am talking patriotism. I am talking patriotism, and not one of you dare go back and look the motherhood of your districts in the face and tell them the truth—that every mother of them will have to go down into the valley, 691,000 mothers of the United States each year, and bring forth a man child, and what for? To keep on the rotten thrones of Europe their tottering monarchs. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Oh, yes, there appeared on the floor of this House last Tuesday afternoon the ruddy-faced giant champion of the league of nations, handsome to look upon, and he came clothed in white, and for what purpose? Why, to snatch the halo from the Christ and place it on the brow of Woodrow Wilson as the savior of the world. You men are honest over on the Democratic side of the aisle just as well as we are over here, and you love your country, but you do not dare go back to your districts and tell the people the truth about the league of nations. You do not dare go back and tell them that the American boy, with his ruddy face and his clear eyes and his sweet, pure blood—because they do not take any other kind—you do not dare go back and tell them that they have to be sent overseas to fight for Turkey.

You do not dare go back and tell them that back of it all is the venturesome American dollar, which seeks protection with American blood. Oh, give out the truth, Republicans and Democrats alike, about this miserable paper that the President of the United States has brought forth. And why did he bring it forth? He alone knows; he did not ask for advice from the men he took with him. He had his head in the air, and his feet were off the ground. Oh, yes, he could see them suffering in Armenia. Yes; he could see them over there, but he did not realize that back home, with all of the great wages that are being paid to the toilers of America, that unrest was abroad in our land. He thought more of the folks over yonder than he thought of the folks at home. You know that I am only talking to you for common honesty. I want you to tell your people the truth about the league of nations. Tell them that our country, peopled with the sons and the offspring of those who left those cursed lands overseas and landed on these shores of liberty, must now provide the soldiers to be sent back to those lands to fight to keep those rotten monarchs on the thrones of Europe. Tell the mothers the truth. You gentlemen on the Democratic side, show the courage to tell the truth. Not one of you dare deny that article 10 of that document means just what I have said, and you know that your Secretary of War, as was disclosed on the floor of this House yesterday, asked for 691,000 of our keen American boys each year.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. WELTY. What did the Military Committee recommend on that matter?

Mr. MURPHY. I wish I could answer the gentleman. I really do not know.

Mr. WELTY. The Military Committee is in charge of the Republicans, is it not? Did they not recommend——

Mr. MURPHY. Oh, I only have a little time, and I can not yield further. Oh, go back, if you want to be honest—go back and tell the mothers the truth.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURPHY. Tell the mothers of America what the truth is. That is what I want you to do.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] has the floor, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY] will take his seat.

Mr. WELTY. And I asked the gentleman whether he will yield for a question. Who introduced the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Sergeant at Arms will seat the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY].

Mr. MURPHY. He is afraid to go back and look the womanhood of America in the face and tell them the truth, that 691,000 boys——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] will suspend. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY] will take his seat and not interrupt his colleague.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. And the gentleman from Texas will take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. But I ask for my constitutional privilege to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will take his seat.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, may I make a point of order under my constitutional right as a Representative of the people of this country?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas may make a point of order, but may not precede it with an explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] is offensive to the Members of the Democratic side of the House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WELTY. Did not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. He yielded to a question and then declined to yield further.

Mr. WELTY. Did I not have the right to ask the question?

The CHAIRMAN. Not unless he yielded further.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] declined to yield further, as was his right.

Mr. WELTY. But what authority has the Chairman to send me to my seat if my colleague yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. Because the gentleman from Ohio refused to yield further, and the gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I hope this time will not come out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. This does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, a few short weeks ago the great Democratic leader returned from his vacation from across the seas, and after he found the temper of the American people was against his pet scheme he boasted that he would write it into the peace treaty—this miserable—oh, what shall we call it? It means so much trouble to the world. It means more trouble, however, back home in your districts when the good women come to understand it and get a chance to vote, as we provided by the resolution which we passed not so long ago.

Mr. WELTY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. No; I have not the time.

Mr. WELTY. Just for a question?

Mr. MURPHY. No. I seem to be telling the truth, do I not—as you do not seem to like it [applause on the Republican side]—as you do not want to hear it. Your leader is going out to appear before the people of this great land as the savior of oppressed peoples [applause on the Democratic side], forgetting he bowed his head to the rape of Shantung. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.] How do you like it?

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen will not interrupt the gentleman without his permission.

Mr. MURPHY. Go back home and tell your mothers—I am pleading for the home; I am pleading for the homes of your people as well as mine. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Yes; but you will not laugh in the faces of those good women.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. No. You do not dare go home and tell the truth about this so-called league of iniquities. Ah, men, you know all about it. You might just as well know that your leader is going out to try to fool the people of this great land for the second—well, I do not know how many times he has tried to fool them. He kept his chair because of the slogan, "He kept us out of war!" And, great God, men of this House, this article that so many of you laughed at—ah, just think of it—this man of whom it is said he kept us out of war has a Secretary of War asking for the largest standing army that our Nation ever had. Ah, some of you may think this is a joke, but I tell you, men, you should get down on your knees and ask Divine guidance in this one particular matter. This is the thing for you to do.

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody kneel.

Mr. MURPHY. Yes; you need it. The country at this moment is on edge. You do not know just what is ahead of you. You find that your great leader has fooled the great laboring masses of this country, until to-day they do not know what to expect next at his hands. [Applause on the Republican side.] Oh, yes; he is going to my State to make his first appeal. Yes; but you watch them answer from my State. Gentlemen, it was not my purpose to try to lecture [laughter on the Democratic side], but it is my purpose as a patriotic American, because I look into your faces on this side and on that side, and I realize as I look there that you men, 90 per cent of you, did not come from homes of affluence; 90 per cent of you were born into American life from the humble homes, and by your efforts you have landed here, and that condition that has made it possible for you to be here is being menaced by this document, and that is why I am calling the attention of this House to its dangerous effects on this Nation.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. We want this country in the future for our children to be as good a country as it has been for us, and right now I want to tell you, as never before since the signing of the Declaration of Independence——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Has the freedom of all of the people of this great Nation been menaced as it is by this nefarious document. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think that the magnificent speech of the gentleman from Ohio ought to be answered, and I therefore yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman—— [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of bespeaking for the gentleman from Texas the same order and consideration that the preceding speaker received. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, it ill becomes the gentleman from Ohio to admonish the Democrats on this side of the aisle to get down upon their knees and pray to Almighty God when the time has come, unfortunately, in the history of this House when, by the command of our Republican Speaker, our supplications must be specially framed according to Republican recipe, so as not to embrace any hope of universal peace and brotherly love, for which the lowly Savior of men meekly taught us to pray. [Laughter and applause.]

And likewise, unfortunately, by the command of the Republican Speaker of the House, the distinguished, Godly, blind Chaplain of this House, though a Republican, has been denied the privilege of praying without restraint for Democrats, and though during his many sessions of valuable service as nonpartisan Chaplain of this House he in years past wast taught by leaders of the Republican Party that an established peace guaranteed by a league of nations was a condition much to be sought after and worthy to be prayed for, his pious lips are now sealed and this blind follower of the Nazarene has been forbidden by Republican mandate to pray for Divine guidance in assisting Congress to bring about a cessation of cruel war and the establishment of universal peace, forsooth, because our Republican colleagues have denominated same Democratic doctrine.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret I have not the time to yield. I agree with the gentleman who preceded me that the President should tell the truth at Columbus, Ohio, next Thursday; but it is not the truth the gentleman from Ohio and his Republican partisan colleagues want. If he told the whole truth he would tell the good people of Ohio that on June 13, 1918, the Secretary of War advised us that it would not be necessary to draft our young boys and send them to the trenches, as he only needed 2,300,000 new soldiers and he had 21,000,000 available able-bodied, grown men from which to select the number, and that he was going to make every able-bodied man either work or fight. And the President would then be forced to tell the people of Ohio what happened, namely, that Samuel Gompers threatened that he would not permit the "Work or fight" order to apply to labor unions, and then, and then only, it was that after our Democratic chairman of the Military Affairs Committee refused to be intimidated by Samuel Gompers and refused to obey his command, which meant the drafting of 670,000 18-year old boys, then it was that the gentleman from California, the present Republican chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, came to the rescue of Samuel Gompers and protected the members of labor unions from being drafted even though they refused to work in 6,000 strikes, and fathered and passed his pernicious law drafting into the service 670,000 18-year boys, and then the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] went to Europe and bragged about it in such loud tones that the war lords of Europe heralded him as our Secretary of War, so great was his dignity, and so apparent was his military mien and carriage. And if the President should be so unkind to the Republican Party as to tell the whole truth to the good people of Ohio at Columbus next Thursday he would be forced to tell them that since the military gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has returned from exchanging ideas with the war lords of Europe, it is the gentleman from California, the Republican chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, and he alone, who now seeks to sow militarism in the United States by preaching universal military training.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota, the active Republican whip, but I have a more serious duty to perform. The Republican chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who seeks now to inflict upon the country a quasi military government, is the deserving target at which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] should justly aim his venomous darts if he would protect the good mothers of our land from having their young sons forcibly taken from their arms and the needed influence of homes and firesides and sent to the military camps of the country, as it is Mr. KAHN, distinguished Republican leader, who is now arranging to force such a pernicious law down the throats of Congress through the majority vote of his Republican machine now running Congress.

And I want to serve notice on the gentleman from California right now that there is one Democrat in this House who is not going to vote for his compulsory military measure as it is now framed when it comes up in the House for consideration. If the President were to tell the truth to the people of Ohio, he would tell them, not that the league of nations seeks to take the boys away from their firesides, but, if the President tells the truth, which he will do, because there is nothing in him but the truth—[laughter on the Republican side and applause on the Democratic side]—when he tells the people of Ohio the truth he will tell them that by the league of nations, which he as the leader of the people of this country has brought before the gentlemen on the other side of the Capitol for consideration, he hopes to reduce to the minimum the chances of ever again burying in France 50,000 of the brave men of this country. He would tell them that by that very league of nations, which is largely the product of his incomparable mind and statesmanship more than that of any other man in the world, he expects to let the people of this country live in peace hereafter as long as this Republic stands. He would not tell them it would keep them out of war forever, because it will not. And there is no law that will keep them out of war forever as there is no State law that will prevent all crime. There is no law that can change the leopard's spots. The instincts of disobedience to law will be in humanity as long as the world lasts, and it will crop out in nations as it crops out in individuals. But by the league of nations the President hopes, as I say, to make it absolutely impossible for one nation ever again to successfully declare and maintain war against another.

I want to say that it ill becomes the gentleman from Ohio to attempt to speak in behalf of the mothers, to say one word against the league of nations, because all the mothers of the land favor it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

If the President should tell the people of Ohio the whole truth at Columbus next Thursday, he would advise them that while Republican leaders on the other side of the Capitol have for weeks been trying to assassinate the league of nations and all hopes of universal peace, loudly applauded by eastern munitions manufacturers, the Republicans, now in control of this House, have wasted week after week of the valuable time of Congress in passing class legislation, such as the surgical-instrument and chemical-glass measures, the tungsten-ore bill, and the pearl-button bill, thus taking from the poor people of this country millions of dollars annually and placing same into the pockets of rich manufacturers who furnish the campaign funds for Republican politicians.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose in asking time to pursue the line of discussion with which we have just been regaled. But there is a matter that has been called to my attention and to the attention of all the Members of Congress, I assume, that in my judgment is a matter of sufficient importance to justify my calling attention to what I regard to be a very grave injustice to one of the great existing agencies of the Government at the present time.

It seems that some association, called the "Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines," with headquarters in the city of Philadelphia, through one of their directors, a Mr. Browning, a week ago last Sunday, in the New York Tribune and in other papers of the country, made a very unwarranted assault upon the present administration of the Federal Board for the Vocational Rehabilitation of Wounded and Disabled Soldiers. Now, gentlemen, in this period, when it seems investigations and suspicions and rumors and various reports so easily find lodgment in the minds of our people, and where there is an existing governmental agency which is performing a great function in what I regard and what I believe the evidence shows a most efficient and most patriotic manner, that when an assault is made upon its entire administration and the results that it is accomplishing, which charges and assaults have no foundation in fact, they should be resented on the floor of Congress, because this organization is one of the creatures of an act passed by this assembly.

To illustrate the unwarranted and unfounded nature of this attack that has been made upon the Vocational Board, I desire to call attention to a few of the charges in concrete fashion, in order that you may see the nature and scope of the untrue statements that have been sent over the country, for what purpose I do not know, and actuated by what motive I shall not undertake to judge, but which, if uncorrected, gentlemen, will certainly have a great tendency unjustly to discredit this great organization. I will state that the charge is made that many of those being trained under the board's auspices have objected to their pay being reduced by the board by the amount they earned while learning a new trade. The answer to that by Dr. Prosser, the director of the board, is that no deduction has been made or will be made by the board in the training of disabled men of money incidental to their work while in training—a categorical denial of the charge that has been made.

I want to assert this, that the proof in this case shows after these charges were made by Mr. Browning that a direct invitation was sent to him by the Federal Board for Vocational Education to come before the board and review these charges and be corrected as to the misinformation which has been given him, and that he has declined to do it.

Another grievance of the association is that it has not learned of a single disabled soldier among the one thousand nine hundred and odd employees of the Federal board. That is a damaging charge. That is one calculated, gentlemen, to prejudice the disabled soldiers, and all soldiers, as well as the people, against the administration and officials in charge of this board. And the man who undertakes to make a charge of that grave character against a Government administration and its officials, certainly in justice to the public and to the soldiers of this country ought to know what he is talking about before he makes it.

The fact is that the records show at the present time that there are 256 ex-service men in the employ of the board, of whom 48 received disabilities in the service.

Another charge is that the Federal board has failed to be guided in the administrative work by sound scientific principles evolved by other countries that have been recognized as pioneers in the work of vocational education. The answer to that is, and it is the truth, that the statement is without foundation. The former vocational secretary of the Canadian Military Hospital Commission has been assigned to the board as special advisor since the very beginning of the work, and he is there yet.

Another charge is that according to the report of the Federal board, made under date of June 21, 1919, only 11 men have been placed in remunerative employment after completing courses of training. The answer to that is, as stated by Dr. Prosser—and these facts can all be verified by the records of the board—that of 119 men reported by the district officers as completing training, 12 will not resume employment now because they are ill or resting; 35 will resume training in the fall; 6 have left training giving no address; and the status of 12 cases has not been reported.

This leaves a balance of 54 men, of whom 42 have been placed and have concluded their training.

Now, I will not have the time to go on, as I wish I could, to reply to some of these charges in detail.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield for a brief question.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman to state just how a wounded or crippled soldier might get into one of these schools? I have a great many letters inquiring about that subject.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can answer that. If you will direct an inquiry to the National Board for Vocational Training they will send you full information on the subject.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I have already done that. They sent it to Chicago.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is your State?

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Illinois.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The district office is located, I imagine, in Chicago, in charge of a director. He has charge of the details of taking these applications and sending out men to pass upon them. If the gentleman will pursue that course, or if any disabled soldier will pursue it, he will have no difficulty in getting his application granted if he comes within the law.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. I started on that line, but have not heard from them yet.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman probably has not had a reasonable time.

Now, I wish to give a summary of the work that has been done by this board up to date, despite the charges made by Mr. Browning to the effect that the board are not getting the disabled soldiers into training. This statement was issued by Dr. Prosser on August 22, 1919:

To this date a total of 14,876 cases have been approved for training, of which 7,356 have been placed in training, the rest having been notified of the approval of their courses and are awaiting the opening of the schools which they will attend in September. It is obviously impossible to send these men to school until the schools open. A total of about 17,000 men will be in training by October 1. In the seven months since demobilization of disabled men in large numbers began and the board secured entrance to the military hospitals, the board has approved for training as many men as Canada has approved in four and one-half years of war, and has in training at the present time as many men as Canada. From present indications the United States will by October 1 have passed the Canadian figures as to total number of men in training since the war began in 1914.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. CARAWAY. If a soldier has been discharged from the service but has been disabled, how does he go about it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. He pursues the same course as that I have outlined.

Mr. CARAWAY. He writes to the Bureau of War Risk for his compensation, does he?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Bureau of War Risk has absolute charge of the compensation. The Vocational Board has nothing to do with it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he writes to either of these boards, do you reckon he will get the information?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. CARAWAY. If he writes to either of these boards, he will get a reply, will he not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume he will. So far as the Vocational Board is concerned, I think I can stand sponsor for the proposition that they answer their correspondence, whether it comes from a soldier or from some official of the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. That has not been my experience. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement. Neither one of these bureaus, in my experience, has replied to requests.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have heard a great many complaints about the War Risk Bureau not answering letters, but not about this board.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not a fact that in the last few days there has been eliminated the rule with reference to compensation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am coming to that. I am glad the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yielded me time in order to cover that situation.

The charge is made in this newspaper publication, in a memorandum which I believe was presented to the President of the United States, asking an investigation of this department, that there had been complaints in regard to the long delay which wounded and disabled soldiers had to undergo before they could begin to draw money from the Vocational Board. Every Member of Congress certainly is familiar with the proposition, and Mr. Brown and his association, before they made these serious charges, should have acquainted themselves with the law on this subject. Until we passed the bill after the special session began a few weeks ago, the Vocational Board had no authority under existing law to take over men for vocational training until their compensation status had been determined by the War Risk Bureau, and no doubt confusion and ignorance as to the law accounts in a large measure for these complaints. At the present time and under existing law the Vocational Board has authority to take over men for training who come within the limitations of the Vocational Educational Board, pending the adjustment of the compensable status by the War Risk Bureau.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not the criticism now that the board is not performing its duty in putting these boys into training as rapidly as it should?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is a question I am undertaking to answer. That is one of the criticisms. I started out to say that it was estimated in the beginning that the minimum number of men, judging from the experience of Canada, that would be taken over in the entire administration of this law would be 15,000 men.

Up to date, as shown by the statistics furnished here by the Director of the Vocational Board, by the 1st of October there will be in training 17,000 wounded and disabled men. If this board took over any men contrary to the provisions of the law affecting their status there would be complaint and criticism. As a matter of fact, this board has been subjected to criticism on the floor of Congress to the effect that it was too eager and too zealous in reaching out to take men in and too enthusiastic in trying to get in touch with men who had the right to avail themselves of this law. But I want to assert here, because I have tried to keep in intimate touch with the operations of this board, that nowhere in the Government service today—and I want to say this in justice to these men, none of whom are from my section of the country, and I do not know that any of them belong to my political party—I want to say, in justice to Dr. Prosser and his immediate associates, that there are no men under the Government to-day who, since they began their duties, have labored with greater devotion and more zealous assiduity to perform their duties under the law than they. They have been working on Sundays and long hours at night for the purpose of getting in touch with these men, because they have a humane interest in the proper and effective administration of this law, and I regret, gentlemen, that upon unfounded charges, upon statements which can not be verified by the evidence, an effort is being made to discredit the minds of soldiers, sailors, and marines and the people of this country generally the integrity of the entire administration of this great work.

The secretary of the National Council of the Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, under date of August 27, in an answer to Dr. Prosser's refutation of the complaints made with amazing frankness, states, "We will not pretend at the moment to say whether or not this lack of confidence is justified, but that it exists shows very clearly the need of an investigation."

They demand an investigation not upon reliance of facts within their knowledge but upon surmise and suspicion only.

I simply rise, gentlemen, as I have felt it my duty to do as a Member of this House and as one who knows what that board has been doing, to resent these charges and to present a few answers to the unfounded statements that have been made.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with a great deal that the gentleman has said and think that the most of those charges were unfounded; but it seems to me that this is true, that the Vocational Educational Board, by their publicity, created a great many unfounded hopes and ideas in the minds of soldiers as to what they could do which they can not do and which the law does not give them authority to do, and I think a certain amount of blame attaches to Dr. Prosser and the rest of them for having promoted false hopes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What false hopes did they hold out?

Mr. PLATT. They have made a lot of soldiers who are not disabled enough to be handicapped in resuming their vocations think they are entitled to take these courses and to receive the generous support provided.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman assert the board has ever held out any inducement to men who were not wounded to make them think they were eligible under the law?

Mr. PLATT. Dr. Prosser himself says that thousands of soldiers who are not entitled to these benefits are making requests of this board in order to get the pay or support provided, and I think it is the fault of some of the extravagant publicity of the board.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the board has ever sent out any publicity or ever held out any hopes to men who were not disabled that they could take advantage of this law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think I have said all I desire to say, but in order that this whole matter may be properly presented I ask unanimous consent that the communications to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The communications are as follows:

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
Washington, August 22, 1919.

To Members of the Congress:

There has been called to the attention of the Federal Board for Vocational Education by several Members of Congress a communication addressed to all the Members of that body by Robert Browning, signing himself as field representative of a new organization known as the Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines. Inasmuch as this communication was apparently made without knowledge of the actual conditions, the board invited Mr. Browning to come to its office at Washington in order that these errors might be pointed out to him and the actual facts placed in his hands. Since he has failed to do this and has allowed his publicly made statements to stand without correction, the board finds it necessary to send to the Members of Congress the following answers to his statements, the latter being given in quotation marks, followed by the statement of the board.

I.

"Many of those being trained under the board auspices have objected to their pay being reduced by the board by the amount that they earned while learning a new trade. This is manifestly unfair, they claim, since such a method offers no incentive for progress and it encourages the employer to exploit the disabled soldier."

* * * * * * *

No deductions have been made or will be made by the board in the training pay of disabled men because of moneys earned incidental to their work while students in training in shops, offices, farms, or anywhere else.

II.

"Another grievance of the association is that it has not learned of a single disabled soldier among the one thousand nine hundred and odd employees of the Federal board."

* * * * * * *

The records show that at the present time there are 256 ex-service men in the employ of the board, of whom 48 received disabilities in the service. Preference is being given to discharged soldiers, and among discharged soldiers to those who, in spite of their disability, will be able to qualify under the civil-service rules and do the work. Most of the employees of the board are female stenographers and typists. Where disabled men are qualified for this work, they have been given employment. Disabled men in training in commercial courses are being assisted by the district offices to qualify under the civil service as soon as they are able so that vacancies in the force of the board may be recruited from their ranks. It must be remembered that while the civil service has, under the President's order, established a separate list of ex-service men these men must meet the civil-service requirements as to qualifications in order to be eligible to employment—a process that requires time.

III.

"A number of men have complained that in spite of President Wilson's order that physical examination be waived in the cases of men certified by the Federal board for civil-service jobs, the board refused to give the men the required data, and that consequently they were unable to obtain the positions under the civil service."

* * * * * * *

The board receives applications of disabled men who desire to train for civil-service positions. Up to the present time 61 men have applied through the board for training for civil-service positions. The following table shows the action taken by the Civil Service Commission on these cases since May 17, 1919:

Approved	27
Approved if the test for physical disability which the board is having made is satisfactory	14
Rejected for one position, but approved for another	4
Returned for further medical data	5
Rejected because disability made work impossible	11

Even if it appears to the representative of the Civil Service Commission on the first review of the case when it is presented to them by the board that a man can not qualify for the position desired, the door of opportunity is not closed to the man. If his physical condition improves, or if a satisfactory test is made later, the man's case can again be placed before the civil service for a decision.

The above table shows that only 11 applications for civil-service positions have been rejected by the commission. Some of these cases were those of men suffering from active tuberculosis who will not be put in training by the board under any conditions. In other cases the man desired an occupation which was entirely unsuited to the nature of his disability. These cases were rejected by the commission and very excellent recommendations made as to opportunities in other Government positions.

IV.

"The Federal board has failed to be guided in the administration of its work by the sound scientific principles evolved by other countries that have been recognized as the pioneers in vocational reeducation."

* * * * * * *

The statement that the Federal board has not been guided in the administration of its work by the scientific principles evolved by other countries is without foundation. The former vocational secretary of the Canadian Military Hospital Commission has been assigned to the board as special advisor since the very beginning of the work. The former district vocational officer of the Province of Alberta organized most of the district offices and has been field organizer in the United States since the very beginning of the work. Representatives of the Federal board visited France and made a thorough study of the French rehabilitation system. A study of the systems used in the various countries will show that Canada and the United States are far ahead in the administration of the problem. The only difference between the United States and Canada is in the fact that the United States Government is very much more liberal in awarding subsistence and training to disabled men. A great many men now in training in this country would not be considered eligible for training in Canada. It is also true that no other country has the provisions available for practically all disabled men that are made available by section 3 of the vocational-rehabilitation act under which, as has already been stated, every man awarded compensation under the war-risk insurance act may pursue a course of instruction for which the Government will pay the entire cost, without subsistence, while in training.

V.

"According to a report of the Federal board under date of June 21, 1919, only 11 men have been placed in remunerative employment after completing courses of training. This would indicate an alarmingly low figure, considering the number of disabled soldiers who have completed courses."

* * * * * * *

Of the 119 men reported by district officers as completing training, 12 will not resume employment now because they are ill or resting; 35 will resume training in the fall; 6 have left training giving no address; and the status of 12 cases has not been reported. This leaves a balance of 54 men, of whom 42 have been placed, or have placed themselves. Twelve men only are pending placement, and their cases are being pushed vigorously. It is difficult to secure the immediate placement of normal men, including even those discharged from the service without disabilities. The problem becomes doubly difficult when the man has a handicap, and often requires testing and time. Inasmuch as the status of men in and out of employment and in training changes rapidly, the number given above (12) will vary, but in general it expresses the situation. The statement that only 11 men completing courses have secured employment, and that therefore 108 men have finished their work and have been neglected by the board is obviously untrue.

VI.

"Hundreds of men have complained that they were compelled to wait from six weeks to six months without pay and forced to depend on the help of friends or charity before their cases were finally acted upon by the board."

* * * * * * *

It is not the function or duty of the board to provide support for men immediately on discharge from the service or to provide support for any disabled men, other than those who have been placed in training because they are in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of their disability. Support of disabled men after discharge was provided for by the Congress in giving a $60 bonus and by paying compensation through the War Risk Insurance Bureau for disabilities received. Furthermore, the original vocational rehabilitation act provided that the board could not make payments to men in training until compensation was awarded by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

At the time the President signed the amendment to section 2 of the vocational rehabilitation act there were 3,633 cases which had passed the district case boards and had been approved for training by the Washington office. In the discharge of its responsibility the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is required by law to secure legal proof of many things before it can award compensation, and unavoidable delays result. These 3,633 men had not been awarded compensation, and the board was, therefore, legally unable to approve or provide training. Since July 11 all of these cases have been acted upon, and the districts have been authorized to proceed with training in all cases in which the training was necessary within the meaning of the amended act.

VII.

"It has recently come to the attention of the association that the Federal board has issued to its 14 district officers an order that precedence be given to cases of seriously disabled men over those with minor injuries. Such a ruling is resented by the thousands of soldiers who have suffered less conspicuous disabilities, but who, nevertheless, are prevented from returning to their old jobs, and who need retraining just as much as the men who have given an arm or a leg in battle."

* * * * * * *

Since it was impossible administratively to handle immediately the many thousands of applications before the board when it was given a free hand by the Congress on July 11, 1919, the board decided to concentrate its efforts in getting men with major occupational handicaps into training at once. We reaffirm the justice and wisdom of this policy. Your attention is invited to the fact that the board's definition of a major occupational handicap includes not only those suffering from loss of limb, which are comparatively few, but many thousands of cases that are suffering from disabilities less obvious than amputations which prevent their return to employment. Moreover, in order to be eligible for training at the present time, it is only necessary for the man to show that he has a temporary major handicap. If he is suffering from a temporary major disability, which may be entirely cured in six months, such as the after effects of chlorine gas, leaving tachycardia and shortness of breath on exertion, he is considered eligible for training. The standards adopted by the Federal Board for Vocational Education are more lenient than those of any other country, and a larger proportion of disabled men will be embraced within the provisions of the vocational rehabilitation act in this country than in any of the warring nations.

An examination of the files of the Federal Board for Vocational Education will show hundreds of applications for training made by men who were discharged with a very slight or almost negligible disability. Several men, for example, who were discharged from the Navy on account of seasickness request training, because they are unable to return to their previous occupation of clerk. On account of the generosity of Congress in providing liberal allowances for disabled men in training, a great many unworthy cases applied for training at the district offices. All of these applications were given due consideration, as it was thought that these men, although suffering from an apparently slight disability, might really be in need of training. It has been found that the men suffering from negligible disability are as insistent on immediate action as those suffering from major disabilities. While the pressure from disabled men was increasing, many experienced men left the staff of the board to return to their former positions, and the work has in consequence been greatly handicapped. It was, therefore, administratively impossible to give serious consideration to all cases with minor disabilities. As an administrative program, it was decided to attend first to the serious cases, get these men in training immediately, and to adjudicate the claims of the slightly disabled men after the more important problems had been met, remembering that they may be assumed to be in receipt of or soon to receive as support such compensation as they are entitled to from the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

VIII.

"The Federal board has acted in a bureaucratic fashion by demanding for its headquarters in Washington absolute power and by depriving its district vocational officers of any initiative."

* * * * * * *

The statement that the Federal board has not given the districts sufficient authority is without foundation. The districts have been given whatever authority is possible. As the board is operating on a budget system, it is impossible to assign the expenditure of funds to the district offices. If the district offices were allowed to place men in training prior to central offices' approval, thereby contracting large obligations, the board would soon contract to spend money far in excess of its appropriations. In order to control the expenditure of Federal funds it is absolutely necessary that control be exercised by the central office and the board thus discharge the duty imposed by Congress.

IX.

The Federal Board for Vocational Education "has shown a decided unwillingness to cooperate with existing agencies that have offered their facilities freely and generously for training and absorbing into employment disabled soldiers."

* * * * * * *

The board is using at the present time 546 existing State and local institutions for training disabled men and is training disabled men on the job in 198 factories, workshops, and offices throughout the country. The board has to its knowledge refused to use offered facilities in not more than six cases and these were refused for good and sufficient reasons.

The board has excellent cooperative arrangements with the Departments of Commerce, Labor, and Agriculture, the War and Navy Departments, the Public Health Service, the Surgeon General's office, War Department, the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, Navy Department, the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the United States Employment Service, the American Red Cross, the Council of National Defense, the National Catholic War Council, the National Manufacturers' Association, the American Federation of Labor, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Elks' War Relief Commission, the Elks' Clubs throughout the country, the Rotary Clubs throughout the country, and war casualty insurance companies throughout the country, as well as many hundreds of others.

The board is cooperating with more than 30,000 public and private agencies, national, State, and local in their scope, and in countless ways is securing invaluable aid from them in the discharge of its task.

X.

"The Federal board has announced that it has made contracts with 146,931 for training and that of this number only 5,808 already have been placed in training. At its present rate of progress it will take the board more than a year to place this number in training. As a result over 100,000 disabled men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board."

The board has not made contracts with any soldiers. They have established contact with 133,367 soldiers. By "contact" is meant that the board has, through its representatives in person or by correspondence, gotten into touch with this number of soldiers. Of this number, 110,135 have actually been interviewed and surveyed by agents of the board in the desire to reach every man in need of training to overcome the handicap of his disability.

Of these men a great majority are not eligible to training under the law, because they are not, in the language of the law, "in need of vocational rehabilitation to overcome the handicap of their disability." They are able to return to their former occupations successfully, where, in addition to their wage, many will receive compensation from the War Risk Insurance Bureau. The board expects to administer the law in the most liberal spirit possible and to give the soldier the benefit of the doubt where any exists. Training under section 3 of the act is made available to every man awarded compensation by the War Risk Insurance Bureau. Every such man is given a course of instruction, if he will take it, and the expense of tuition, books, supplies, and traveling are paid by the Government. In every case where a man, because of a temporary or total disability, is unable to enter employment successfully, the full support provided by the law for him and his dependents is paid in addition. Beyond this the board can not go under the law, whatever may be its personal feelings.

If it is the intention of Congress to provide vocational rehabilitation to every man discharged with a disability rated as 10 per cent or over, Congress should realize the expenditure involved by a program of this magnitude.

The weekly statistical report of the General Staff of August 7, 1919, contains the following:

"The Army had reported to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to July 1 the names of 149,433 men discharged from the Army with disability. Only cases showing 10 per cent disability have been reported. At this rate it seems probable that the total number of cases of disability resulting from the war and entitled to compensation will be close to 200,000."

These figures are exclusive of disabilities incurred in the Navy or Marine Corps. Estimating this number at 50,000 makes a total of 250,000 men discharged with disability rated as 10 per cent or over. If these men receive training with support it will involve an expenditure of $350,000,000; only $16,000,000 have been appropriated. Moreover, the $350,000,000 required for support and tuition for such a group of men does not include their traveling expenses, medical care, or mechanical appliances nor the expenditures for equipment and for administration.

It is impossible to conceive that all men who have received disabilities in the service will need retraining in order to return to their old occupations. The experience of Canada, whose standards are more liberal than those of any of the European countries, shows that approximately 10 per cent of the disabled men need retraining. If this country doubles the percentage of men trained by Canada there would only be 50,000 men to be retrained. The statement that over 100,000 disabled men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board is therefore obviously without foundation.

The theory and intent of the war-risk insurance act and the vocational-rehabilitation act was that compensation should be given to all disabled men to compensate for the disability as a handicap in employment and that training should be given to those unable to return to employment successfully because the handicap of the disability interfered with their specific occupation. Inasmuch as it is not the function of the board to provide compensation as support for all disabled men, but only to provide maintenance for those needing training, the charge that 100,000 men will be waiting without pay from the Federal board has no foundation in law or in fact.

To this date a total of 14,876 cases have been approved for training, of which 7,356 have been placed in training, the rest having been notified of the approval of their courses and are waiting the opening of the schools, which they will attend in September. It is obviously impossible to send these men to school until the schools open. A total of about 17,000 men will be in training by October 1. In the seven months since demobilization of disabled men in large numbers began and the board secured entrance to the military hospitals, the board has approved for training as many men as Canada has approved in four and one-half years of war and has in training at the present time as many men as Canada. From present indications the United States will by October 1 have passed the Canadian figures as to total number of men in training since the war began in 1914.

By increasing the rate of support to men in training the Congress has by recent legislation made the maintenance of disabled men in training and their dependents average about $100 per month, thereby making an award of training financially advantageous. Many people look upon this training pay as a legal right of every man with a disability however slight or negligible, comparable to the $60 bonus and the award of compensation. This is not the law and consequently the board is unable to administer it from any such standpoint; but it is on the basis of this misconception that great pressure is being brought to bear from returned soldiers and persons occupying prominent public positions. To satisfy this demand that every man discharged from the service with a disability be placed on the Government pay roll at an average salary of $100 per month it will be necessary for Congress to amend the present law and to face without hesitation an expenditure of from $400,000,000 to $500,000,000 before the task is completed.

This may be, and in the opinion of many persons is, the best and most equitable solution of the difficulty. They hold that as a measure of social reconstruction every man injured or diseased in the service should be given, at Government expense, a minimum of from 6 to 12 months of training, and believe not only that this training is due all such men as compensation for suffering, but also that money spent in this way on them will provide the largest social return.

The Federal board stands ready and will be glad to answer any inquiries or respond to any call Congress may make for a clear and comprehensive understanding of the administration of the rehabilitation law.

Respectfully, yours,

FEDERAL BOARD FOR VOCATIONAL EDUCATION,
By C. A. PROSSER, Director.

MODERN MEDICINE,
New York, August 26, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD,
Committee on Education, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BANKHEAD: I inclose copy of a letter which I addressed to Robert Browning, field representative of the Association of War Wounded Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, as a protest against the meanness of his attack on the Federal Board for Vocational Education, published in the New York Tribune and other papers on Sunday, August 17, and distributed, I understand, to Members of Congress.

I have never been connected with the Federal Board for Vocational Education, but have been a student of vocational education and of rehabilitation, and have followed the work of the Federal board from its beginning. It is, in my judgment, most unfortunate that a board and its officials who have given such earnest attention to a new and difficult problem should be maligned by publicity-seeking people. I am sure the facts given by me are already in your possession.

I earnestly hope that in the cause of justice and in the interest of constructive work the malicious charges against the Federal board shall be promptly and effectively answered.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN A. LAPP,
Managing Editor.

AUGUST 19, 1919.

ROBERT BROWNING,
Field Representative, the Association of Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines, New York City.

DEAR SIR: You are quoted in the New York Tribune last Sunday as declaring that the Federal Board for Vocational Education is incompetent, etc., and that the funds have been wasted, and that war cripples wait in vain. I presume that your entire statement was not quoted, and that probably the Tribune is at fault in giving garbled extracts. Surely you must know better than the statements indicate, or else the association for war cripples is in a bad way for field representatives or for publicity.

Your statements as quoted do not even bear the semblance of truth. You apparently did not even take the time to learn ordinary facts about the history of the function of the vocational work under the Federal Board. If you would spend a part of your time getting a full understanding of the problems and the difficulties, and in cooperating with the Federal board, instead of attempting to court publicity by unfair charges, there would be some prospect for the disabled soldiers and sailors growing out of your efforts.

Have you conferred with the Federal board about the problems confronting them? Have you investigated the facts? Do you know that it has been a little over a month since the Federal board was given jurisdiction? Are you aware that up to that time no case could be handled by the board until certified by the War Risk Bureau? Do you know that thousands of cases accumulated before that time? Are you aware of the difficulties of getting men to take vocational training? Do you know that personal efforts result in inducing scarcely 50 per cent of the men to take the training? Do you know the difficulties of getting schools and teachers for the work of training? I believe you know some of these things. If you do not, then you are a poor specimen of a field representative. If you do know these things, then your statements are despicable.

I am not in any way connected with the Federal board, but I have been a student of vocational education and of the rehabilitation problem for a number of years, and I have been a close observer of the work of the Federal board, and believe strongly in fair dealing.

The Federal board has assumed and carried tremendous responsibilities in this war. It has approached its problems with a big vision. All of its problems were new in this country, even the idea of vocational training for youth was new. Everything had to be built from the ground up. There were few teachers and schools capable of handling problems of vocational education, let alone vocational rehabilitation education. For many months the War Department attempted to handle the problem and the Federal board could not get in contact with the men until after they were discharged from the hospitals. Then, when that matter was straightened out, the accumulation of claims before the War Risk Bureau occurred. The Federal board has not had a chance until recently to do its work and now you, who profess to be interested in the welfare of the cripples, come forward and, for publicity's sake for yourself, attempt to throw the whole problem into confusion.

No Government in the history of the world ever provided so generously for its wounded men as has this Government, and in no department has there been such earnest effort to do a difficult piece of work for the benefit of the soldiers as has the Federal board. If you are sincere and desire to aid the crippled soldiers you will cooperate with the Federal board in attempting to get the men who were scattered over the country before the Federal board had a chance to interview them to come back to take the training. The attempt to court publicity by such ridiculous statements as you made in the Tribune will do very little good in the cause in which you are supposed to be enlisted.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN A. LAPP,
Managing Editor.

P. S.—Since writing the above I have called the Federal board to inquire if you have ever conferred with them upon the problems of rehabilitation and I have learned that you have never done so, although given a special opportunity. Further comment is unnecessary.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that at the end of 15 minutes the debate thereafter may be confined to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, asks unanimous consent that at the end of 15 minutes the further general debate be confined to the bill itself. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Reserving the right to object, how will the time be divided?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] wishes three minutes, and it will be equally divided among the others.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, there was a time a few weeks ago when all the Members of this House felt that we had performed those duties for which we were called together, and that we might take an adjournment. The appropriation bills had been passed; the amendments relating to woman suffrage and prohibition had been voted upon; the Senate were engaged in discussing the peace treaty and the league of the 32 nations proposed by the President, and they were so rightfully and earnestly engaged that they were not in a position to join with us in the consideration of legislative matters, and all Members felt that we should take an adjournment. Of course there were some objections made for political reasons by one or two Democrats who had already purchased their tickets and made their reservations to go home or to Alaska or somewhere else and who did not expect their objections to prevail. But everyone on both sides of the House was in accord with the idea of adjournment when the Executive sent in a request that we reconsider our action and remain here, and we yielded to that request. But now, gentlemen, when the men who are engaged in the operation of the railroads are taking a vote to see whether or not they will engage in a nation-wide strike when we have the Mexican situation confronting us and becoming very acute, and when we are trying to do everything possible to bring down the high cost of living, it does seem to me that the executive as well as the legislative branch of this Government should stay on the job. [Applause.] I have therefore introduced a resoluton which I will ask to have read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the resolution be read in his time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolution requesting the President of the United States to remain at the seat of the National Government.

"Resolved, That the existing conditions in national affairs are such that another absence of the Chief Executive from the National Capital is fraught with very grave danger to the welfare of our country in these troublous times, in which a crisis involving labor, credits, transportation, the cost of living, profiteering, the welfare of former service men, or foreign relations may assume grave proportions necessitating immediate action by the Chief Executive.

The House of Representatives therefore respectfully request that the President of the United States remain at the National Capital until these pathological conditions shall be remedied or ameliorated.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of this resolution. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The request is not in order now.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] a few minutes ago referred to the resolution which he had introduced relative to an inquiry into the Housing Corporation, and also to my resolution pending before the Committee on Rules. He also referred to the delay of the Committee on Rules in reporting out his resolution after rather extended hearings. At the time reference was made to my resolution two days ago the chairman of the Rules Committee stated that same subject was under consideration in the other branch of Congress. I took pains to go to the document room and inquire for any document relative to any such investigation in the other branch and was unable to find that any resolution of inquiry into the Housing Corporation had been introduced. Yesterday I consulted with the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds [Mr. FERNALD] and found that that committee, without any special resolution, was considering the subject. Personally I hope that such an investigation will be carried on most thoroughly by some official organization of one branch or the other of Congress. It is immaterial where the investigation is made, but it is certainly very apparent that it should be made. Unless the investigation is followed expeditiously in the other branch it certainly is incumbent on the House to take up the matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, we have 27 Members on the floor of the House——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Texas desires to make a point of order, let him make it without explanation or apology.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the Chair hold that I can not call attention to the fact that we have only 27 Members——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Texas may only make the point of order that there is no quorum present, without explanation.

Mr. BLANTON. I have the profoundest respect for the Chairman, and therefore I will obey his ruling, and will make the point that there is no quorum present, because I think that even under Republican control we should have one here to attend to business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 7705, found itself without a quorum; that he had caused the roll to be called, when 243 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I was about to refer to the bill reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds doing away with the Housing Corporation. There is, to my mind, one serious drawback to that bill, although it is an excellent piece of legislation to be finally enacted. It does not reach the seat of the trouble. It merely transfers the remaining work of the Housing Corporation to some other bureau of the Government. It does not reach to an investigation of the extravagance that the Housing Corporation has been guilty of during its existence. That is the point that I desire to reach through a special investigation conducted either by the committee in the other branch or the committee here, or a specially appointed committee, as other investigations have been conducted.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to the fact that a resolution was introduced to accomplish the purpose the gentleman refers to, but it has not yet come before the House. That resolution gives authority to make the investigation.

Mr. TREADWAY. I stated when I had the floor that there was such a resolution pending before the Committee on Rules, together with one more recently introduced by me, but that neither of them has been reported for the reason explained by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, namely, that there is pending in the Senate a similar investigation, and there ought not to be any duplication of the work. But we do want to get at the root of the extravagance and waste that the Housing Corporation has been carrying on under war-time authority. That object will be accomplished some time, in some way, either by this House or the other branch.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman whether it is the part of his contract with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], who furnishes him with an audience, that the gentleman from Texas, having furnished the audience, shall leave the Chamber?

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not the keeper of the attendance nor of the person of the gentleman from Texas, and I prefer not to make any personal reference to him respecting whether he is on the floor or not. He is responsible only to his own sense of duty as a Member of the House and perhaps to his constituents in Texas. Consequently, I ought not to answer the question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PLATT. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is not present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I take it from what the gentleman says that he thinks this bill that he is now discussing should provide for an investigation, as well as for assigning the activities of the Housing Bureau to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would say to the gentleman that we want an investigation of the work that the Housing Corporation has performed during its existence, whether it comes through a special committee or through a committee of either branch of the Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNUTSON. May I ask who raised the last point of no quorum?

Mr. BLANTON. I did.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh.

Mr. BLANTON. I can answer the question. Every time I catch you Republicans without one I am going to call the attention of the country to it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, recent newspaper reports quote Gen. Pershing as saying that he favors the plan to establish a national cemetery in France and as being opposed to the removal of the bodies of our deceased heroes and bringing them back to America. The newspaper reports have caused considerable comment among some of the people throughout my part of Oklahoma, and I think it not out of place at this time to make a few statements respecting the matter.

There seems to be quite a misunderstanding about what is the status of the legal situation respecting the removal of the bodies of our deceased soldiers. It has been currently reported that there is a French law which prohibits the Government of the United States from removing the bodies of these soldiers. At the opening of the war it was agreed between the military authorities—and I think properly so—that no attempt would be made to return the bodies of our soldiers until the close of the war. I think that was a proper order, because of the circumstances attending transportation, and so forth. After that occurred, about January 1, the French Chamber of Deputies passed a law making it three years after the close of the war, and to which law, I am informed, Great Britain, Belgium, and Italy agreed.

Here is how I feel about the matter myself: Wherever the parents of a deceased soldier request the War Department to bring back the body, I think it is the duty of the War Department to bring it back. Out of the requests that went out to the fathers and mothers and nearest of kin, 75 per cent of the answers which came back were in favor of the return of the bodies. There were 10,000 letters in which the writers said they wanted the bodies to remain in France. I think the proper solution of the question would be to bring back the bodies of those whose next of kin or parents request it, and then establish a cemetery over there as a perpetual monument to the bodies of those whose parents do not make that request.

Mr. Chairman, there is a touch of sentiment in this matter. It is something about which legislators should act very carefully, if the matter should come up for legislation. Many of the fathers and mothers in my country who have given their boys, who have died in France, are too poor in this world's goods to make a visit to France, and yet if they are denied the right to have the bodies of their sons brought back to America, as long as they live they will be constantly trying to devise means by which they can raise enough money to visit the final resting place of their loved ones in France.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. In view of the correctness of the last statement, does the gentleman not think it would be something all of the people would desire, that the fathers and mothers of the dead who lie buried in France be taken to France, if they so desire, as the guests of the United States, to visit the graves of their dead?

Mr. McKEOWN. That might be satisfactory to some of them, but here is the proposition: These boys lie buried in foreign soil. In the coming years no one can tell what will take place. They may lie there and may be lying there some day under the German flag, the very people they fought in defending their country. For that reason there is a sentiment about bringing them back to the soil of their own country.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I thoroughly agree with everything the gentleman is saying on that question. I have received a large number of letters, not only from my own district but from others, and I think the sentiment is in favor of bringing back the remains of our soldiers. I think we have the right to do that, notwithstanding any claim made by Great Britain or France or Belgium.

Mr. McKEOWN. The department now, as I understand it, is undertaking to reach an agreement to carry out the first proposition, which was to bring back the bodies at the close of the war, when the last American soldier had started on his return.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I feel sure it is going to be the sentiment of this House, whatever position may be taken by the department, that this matter shall not rest or be permitted to get into such a situation where we find ourselves unable to bring back those bodies. My contention, from the standpoint of a lawyer, is that their removal is not subject to the laws of France. These soldiers went there under military authority and direction, and their remains must be governed by the rules of military power, so far as that regulation was made with France at the time by our department. The mothers and fathers who brought these boys into the world and gave them to their country to die for the flag, or the wives of those who were married, ought to have first consideration in determining the place where their bodies shall rest until the end of time.

By unanimous consent, Mr. MCKEOWN was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, that closes debate, except on the provisions of the bill. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it, the debate now, according to the motion adopted, is confined to the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the Ways and Means Committee so far has introduced two classes of bills—one pertaining to what might be known as key industries and war industries; the other class is what we term emergency bills, cases where an American industry was in danger of being destroyed by foreign competition. The bill which we now have under consideration with reference to pearl buttons belongs to the latter class, the pearl-button industry being in danger of being destroyed by reason of cheap Japanese labor. The pearl-button industry began away back in 1890. Prior to that time there were hardly any made in this country. In the year 1890 a great American statesman, and a great Republican I might say also, brought into this House one of the most scientific tariff bills that had ever been known. It changed the rates, which had heretofore been largely ad valorem—that is, based upon the foreign price of the article—to specific rates. It took care of all of the industries of this country, regardless of whether they were great or small. Among the industries which this great statesman thought worthy of building up at that time was the pearl-button industry, and the tariff of 1890 imposed a duty upon pearl buttons of nearly twice as much as the one which is asked for by this bill. The tariff of 1890, as you remember, remained in force but a short time. A campaign of misrepresentation was instituted against it in the country, and as a result our Democratic friends came into power, and in 1894 the Wilson bill was enacted. The Wilson bill vindicated the judgment of this great statesman when he prepared his bill in 1890. It was not long in operation until all industries all over the country were depressed. In a short time our exports of gold brought our currency to a dangerous situation, in which it was difficult to say whether we could long maintain specie payment.

Our exports became less than our imports. The crisis in our country's affairs was most critical, and McKinley was suggested as the next Republican candidate by reason of the failure of the Wilson bill. I have often wondered why McKinley has no monument in this city; and yet as a fact he needs none. His monument is in the great industries of this country, which he developed and in which this country has come to be the leader, surpassing all the rest of the world.

The tariff of 1897, known as the Dingley bill, succeeded the Wilson bill. The pearl-button industry, which had languished under the Wilson bill, became more prosperous, and the same rates provided in the Dingley bill were also established in the Payne bill, and then came the same campaign of misrepresentation which had originally been made against the McKinley bill, and with the same results. The country, which had prospered so highly, for some reason concluded that it would change its administration and its national policy. It did so by the election of Mr. Wilson, and his administration did so by passing the tariff known as the tariff of October 3, 1913, the Underwood bill, prepared largely by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, now Senator from that State. The results of the passage of that tariff were at once apparent. It was passed in October, and by December the failures in this country were enormously increased. By April the balance of trade, which had been $600,000,000 a year in our favor, had set in against us. Prices of agricultural products greatly decreased, and a great army of unemployed, larger than all those who had been engaged in the great World War which has been just closed, thronged our streets——

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAYS. Is the gentleman discussing the subject of the bill? [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; and I am very sorry if my friend is not able to understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order, though facetious, is not well taken.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As I remarked, a throng of unemployed passed along our streets larger than that of the Army which we have had in the last war, and yet for some reason at that time our Democratic friends thought it was unnecessary to have any labor bureau to take care of them. And where in the spring of 1914 and the summer of 1914 were the Democratic orators who now declaim so vigorously against these tariff bills we have introduced, and among them the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, who, I expect, will have considerable to say with reference to this bill—where were they at the time? Silent as the grave. They stood like so many extinct volcanoes, which had formerly thrown forth smoke and gas, which had obscured the vision. They had nothing to say. The war came on and saved the business situation and saved the Democratic Party. It created an absolute embargo against all importations from Germany and Austria. It stopped the course of trade. It created a demand for our goods, our products. It restored our industries by destroying those of Europe and turned them to the manufacture of munitions. It built up the wealth of this country for the time being at the expense of the blood and tears and misfortunes of Europe. Now that the war is over and this artificial barrier no longer exists a necessity arises for the enactment of tariff bills to save American industries. We have already had an indication in last month's trade with foreign countries, the month of July, of what is coming. Our balance of trade during July fell off $400,000,000. I undertake to predict that as normal conditions follow we will have the same results that we had under the Wilson bill, the same results that we had under the Underwood bill, and, finally, the balance of trade will turn against us entirely, and that we will be overwhelmed with a flood of goods from a people impoverished but still able to work, who occupy now the devastated regions of Europe, which are soon to be restored to their former condition.

We will be overwhelmed by a flood of goods from Japan, as we are now in the case of the pearl-button industry.

In 1912 there was only $28,000 worth of pearl buttons imported from Japan into this country. During the last fiscal year there were more than thirty times as much brought in. The pearl-button industry, which at one time was quite flourishing, having a capital of probably about $5,000,000, giving employment to about 20,000 people, and turning out $5,000,000 or more in goods every year, by reason of the influx of cheap Japanese goods has been placed on the road to entire destruction. It is utterly impossible for us to compete in this country with Japanese labor. The cost of manufacturing in this country is about ten times as much per day, so far as daily wages are concerned. The Japanese workmen probably not being able to turn out as much per man as the American workmen, the entire cost in this country is about six times that in Japan. By reason of the influx of Japanese goods our factories have been unable to sell their products. Thirteen million gross of buttons have accumulated on the shelves of the American manufactories, which they are unable to sell. Their factories are running on about 40 to 60 per cent time and they are running on insufficient wages. The workmen are not being paid the wages they ought to be paid, and yet the factories are running at a loss. Recently there was a labor disturbance at Muscatine, Iowa, where probably the largest factory in the whole country in the button industry is located. The governor of Iowa appointed a commission to examine into the causes of this trouble which existed between the manufacturer and his employees. The commission appointed by the governor was an entirely impartial commission, except it might be said that it contained one man who was intended to represent labor.

The commission reported that the manufacturers were not paying the wages that ought to be paid to the men in order to support them in proper condition. But it reported also that they were paying all they could possibly afford, and in some instances actually losing money. And I received a letter from one of the members of this commission stating that it was impossible for this industry to continue unless it was protected in some way from the competition which it is now obliged to meet by reason of the low rates of the Underwood bill.

Now, with reference to this bill I would say that it is a moderate one, which offers the rates which formerly prevailed in the Payne bill. The tariff rates are a cent and a half a line and 15 per cent ad valorem. These rates never have and never will affect the consumer in the least. Many gentlemen may not understand what is meant by a line. A line is one-fortieth of an inch. The buttons which I have here on my shirt are probably 14 or 16 lines—I think a 14-line button. A cent and a half a line would be one and one-half times 14, or 21 cents per gross, plus 15 per cent ad valorem, which would amount variously from 1 up to 5 cents per gross, according to the original value of the button. The tariff in this bill on the buttons of a shirt would not exceed a cent.

Now, these buttons are made in all sorts of sizes. Here is a button [exhibiting] which is about a 20-line button; that is about half an inch across.

Mr. BOX. May I ask the gentleman how many lines there are to the inch?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A line is one-fortieth of an inch. The tariff rate on that would be one and one-half times 20, plus 15 per cent ad valorem on the original cost, which probably in Japan would be somewhere around 30 cents a gross.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. The gentleman stated that there were about 13,000,000 pearl buttons on the shelves.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I stated it much stronger than that. I said 13,000,000 gross.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Thirteen million gross?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Now, for what reason are they not being sold? Is it due to the fact that the market is overstocked or that those who hold on the shelves this large supply of buttons are unwilling to put them on the market at the price at which buttons are being sold now?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I suppose they can sell them at some price, as far as that is concerned. They are unable to sell them at a price which would pay them for making them; that is, which would pay the cost of making them.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Does the gentleman understand that the market is overstocked at present?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The market is overstocked at present.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. And these buttons in such a large amount are not being held purely to await the passage of a bill raising the tariff?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; they could not have been manufactured and held for that purpose, for the reason that they accumulated before this bill was ever proposed or before it was ever thought to present the matter to Congress. The reason for their accumulation is because in some places, like the town of Muscatine, the whole community depends entirely upon the manufacture of buttons. If the factory is shut down a large number of the people will absolutely have to starve. They have no other way of living; they have no other trade; they are dependent wholly on this industry. There are somewhere from 20,000 to 30,000 people in the United States who are dependent upon this industry. Gentlemen say it is a small one. Small industries have their rights to be protected as well as large ones.

And this bill is important in another way. We will determine by the passage of this bill—and I am satisfied it will pass—whether the President of the United States is willing that the workingmen of this country shall be protected against the cheap labor of the Orient. The gentlemen upon the other side will also have to pass upon that question.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the button industry, as I have said, is a small one. But the time has come to give it protection or let it pass out of existence once and for all. The rates which we ask are moderate. They are rates which were established at a time when the industry was not obliged to meet this Japanese competition, which did not begin until about 1912. The competition from Germany and Austria was not nearly so severe in 1909 when the Payne bill was enacted.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman has a very interesting exhibit, and I would like to ask him a question in regard to it, as to the relative amount of handwork and machine work. It would seem from some of the larger shells appearing there in the middle that the buttons are cut out by a die, which, of course, is done by machinery?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. How much of the work is done by hand, and how much hand labor is there as compared with the amount of machine labor?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If I understand the question of the gentleman correctly, very little of the labor is what might be called hand labor. The greater portion of it is done by machines which are semiautomatic, which simply need the attention of the workman to turn out these buttons in great numbers. As the gentleman will see, we use such an enormous amount of these buttons that it is necessary to have some machine of that kind.

Now, I ought to have spoken of the blanks that are exhibited here in great numbers. Here is a simple disk of pearl, which shows the first stage of manufacture.

Mr. TILSON. That is evidently cut out by a die stamp—by machinery.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is cut out by machinery.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is cut out by a tubular saw.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes. It is cut out by a tubular saw, as my colleague explains. The rate prescribed by the present bill is somewhat lower than the rate of the Payne bill, being less than the rate on the finished button itself.

Here you see these disks in all stages of manufacture. Here they have been rounded off. That is the second stage. Here an opening is made for the purpose of lessening the distance of drilling and adding to the appearance of the button.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Is that done by grinding or by some tool that cuts it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is done by grinding.

Then here is a button not quite complete, not fully polished, as I take it. They are polished also. About 70 per cent of the value of the button is labor. The rest of it is due to the various stages which it goes through and the expense of the machinery, the shells being first dug and taken to the factory, and then the buttons put through these various stages of manufacture in which costly and complicated machines are required.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether the cheap-made Japanese productions are now being shipped into the United States and offered in our markets?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. KINKAID. I understand they cost a great deal less than these homemade productions cost. Is the gentleman able to say how much?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say this, that the Japanese have been able to put some of their cheaper grades of buttons into the market for less than it costs the American manufacturer when they are completed to put them on that card. [Indicating.] It costs the American manufacturer from 5 to 8 cents per gross to have those buttons put on the card. You can see that is not an unreasonable amount to pay the American workman for putting them on. Some of these Japanese buttons have been sold here for less than it has cost to put them on the card.

Mr. KINKAID. These Japanese factories have shut the Muscatine shops?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To a considerable extent. Some of the pearl-button factories are closed down entirely, and others are running only a part of the time.

Mr. KINKAID. And those are only running in the hope of relief in the future?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; in order to hold their workmen in case they are able to resume full operations, so that they can then conduct their business at a profit. If they can not get relief, they must abandon the business.

Now, I believe I have said all I care to say of the situation with reference to this industry. We confidently expect that the bill will be supported by every Republican in the House, and we are in hopes that some of our Democratic friends will see the error of their ways and also turn to its support. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum. I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 222 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. VAILE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution 8.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint special committee consisting of two Senators and four Representatives appointed to confer with officials of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or any political subdivision thereof, or with officers of any organization or society, or with individuals relative to the contemplated observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, ordered to report its recommendations on or before September 1, 1919, be granted an extension of time for its report and recommendations until December 10, 1919.

TARIFF ON PEARL BUTTONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members of the House, those who are familiar with only the common shellfish of the American seacoast or with the chalky, brittle shells of the streams of the Atlantic slope can have but little conception of the nature and quality of the mussel resources of the Mississippi Basin. In streams large and small throughout the greater part of this wide region, from the Appalachian Mountains to Arkansas and Dakota and from Louisiana to Minnesota, there is a wealth of pearly mussels of a variety of species, the shells of which are thick and firm, with clear, pearly luster, and in some cases displaying beautiful iridescence. Often the shells are strikingly ornamented with knobs and ridges, and the nacre, or mother-of-pearl, may be clear white, delicately tinted, or deeply colored with various shades of pink, salmon, red, or purple. The shells that are most striking in appearance are not, however, the most important. Of greatest value are those having the surface of the shell free from ornamentation or irregularities and with nacre of clear, lustrous white without stains or colors. It is these qualities, combined with a peculiar toughness or absence of brittleness or chalkiness, that lend to the fresh-water-mussel shells the value they now possess as the basis for important manufacture.

Until the mussels assumed economic importance the several species were without distinguishing common names. With the development of the fishery the shellers on the several streams applied the common names which have suggested themselves as appropriate to the appearance of the shell or those which seem to have originated in a spirit of facetiousness. Since the shellers move from place to place, those of one State frequently mingling with those of distant regions, there has come to prevail a better degree of uniformity of names of mussels than of the names of fishes.

As primary products or as by-products of manufacture the mussel shells are brought into commerce in the form of buttons, novelties, jewelry, chicken feed, road materials, composition marble, and otherwise. By far the chiefest use of mussel shells is, however, for the manufacture of pearl buttons, now worn by nearly every individual from the cradle to the shroud. The pearl mussels are also valuable in the production of pearls of a value of about $364,000 a year, but our concern is with the adaptability of the shells for the manufacture of buttons.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that the pearl shell has peculiarities which especially adapt it to the making of buttons by reason of the fact that such buttons are not injured but rather improved by the application of soap and water?

Mr. BOWERS. That is true.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And there is no other material to take its place.

Mr. BOWERS. Nothing has yet been found.

When the manufacture of buttons from fresh-water shells began, in 1891, the yellow-sand shell was the first to be used. As the industry grew the supply of these shells soon proved to be insufficient. According to Mr. Boepple, the mucket, pocketbook, and black-sand shells were then brought into use, but it was not until 1894 that the niggerhead shell was tried. The niggerhead proved to be an excellent shell, with firm texture and beautiful luster, while a portion of it was found to be highly iridescent. This shell gained rapidly in favor and became the standard of price, while in time the valuable but less abundant yellow-sand shells became monopolized by the export trade.

It was the custom of the early shellers to gather the river run of mussels and cook out the meats of all. The yellow-sand shells and niggerhead shells were the only ones saved, while the others were thrown away as worthless. The shellers, however, cooked out the entire lot of mussels in the hope of finding additional pearls and slugs. The shelling and the button industries, therefore, have a history similar to many other American industries in that the pioneers wasted large quantities of good material through lack of knowledge and experience and while secure in the thought that the supply was inexhaustible. In the course of time other shells were brought into use, until now 41 species in all are employed in the manufacture of buttons and novelties.

There are approximately 500 species of fresh-water mussels in the United States. The commercial species are practically restricted to flowing waters derived from the drainage of limestone regions. Such waters include most of the streams of the Mississippi Basin and some of those of the Great Lakes and Gulf drainages. Here the mollusk finds an abundance of lime, as well as of food, with the depths of water, currents, and other conditions favorable to its reproduction and growth. Many species of mussel occur in the streams of the Atlantic coast, but their shells are thin, chalky, and eroded.

An ideal button shell would have the following qualities: The nacre pearly white, or preferably iridescent, free from spots, stains, or colorings; the texture firm throughout, neither brittle nor chalky nor yet too hard; the inner surface smooth; the outer surface free from ridges or protuberances; the thickness uniform, with low umbones or beaks, and tips relatively thick; the shape flattish, oval; the size sufficient to permit of cutting several blanks. There are, however, no ideal button shells to be found. Some valuable for certain desirable qualities are yet far from perfection in other respects. A few approach the ideal, but the same species is not always uniform in quality in different rivers nor even in different parts of the same river.

A given species may yield a good working shell in one river, while in another stream its shell shows hard and soft spots, stains, dullness of nacre, or other poor qualities. For example, the washboard of the upper Illinois River, while extra large, is badly stained; yet the same species in the lower stretches of this river, though much smaller, is flatter and so free from spots as to make a much better material for buttons. The muckets of the Kankakee, Wabash, and upper Mississippi Rivers are extra good.

Of the North American species of fresh-water mussels, more than 500 in all, we have named 64 as more or less familiar to the fishermen, but of these only 41 can be classed as having commercial value in the shell trade. Some of the others are valuable as producers of pearls.

Looking at the 41 used in manufacture more closely, we find only 17 that are of real importance at the present time. It is desirable to name these separately. These are known as niggerhead, hickory nut, pimple back, maple leaf, monkey face, pig toe, Ohio River pig toe, blue point, three ridge, washboard, mucket, southern mucket, Lake Pepin mucket (fat mucket), butterfly, pocketbook, yellow-sand shell, and black-sand shell.

Many manufacturers or buyers would reduce this list by omitting several of the species, but there would probably be little agreement as to the species to be eliminated.

The best of all species at the present time are the yellow-sand shell, the niggerhead, the yellow-back mucket, and the Lake Pepin mucket, the last three being approximately of equal value. The yellow-sand shell has been used entirely for export and commands a price nearly double that of other species. Many niggerheads were exported a few years ago, causing a distinctly advanced price.

There is a great deal of variation in quality among the several species. Some shells are better for one purpose, while others are better for another.

Within the species there is variation according to the locality in which the mussels have grown. A mussel may have a shell of good quality in one stream and of poor quality in another. The differences may apply to color, luster, texture (firm, chalky, brittle, or hard), and form (shape and thickness).

Within the same mussel bed there may be differences in quality in the same species. We may find side by side pink muckets, white muckets, and so forth.

The shells of the Quadrula class show more uniformity in quality over the entire region of distribution than those of the Lampsilis class.

Iridescence is best shown in the niggerhead and pimple-back groups, but only a very small percentage of truly iridescent buttons can be obtained in any case.

The following streams have had the value of the shell and pearl products to the fishermen at the river tabulated as follows:

[1] Minor tributaries are included with the main stream.

Minor mussel streams not included in the foregoing table may be classified as follows: (1) Those with shell product exceeding pearl product in value and (2) those with pearl product greater than shell product. The streams in each of these two classes are as follows, the arrangement being alphabetical: 1. Big Sunflower, Miss.; Blue, Kans.; Bourbeuse, Mo.; Cedar, Iowa; Cottonwood, Kans.; Des Moines, Iowa; Eel, Ind.; Embarrass, Ill.; Grand, Mich.; Green, Ky.; Holston, Tenn.; Huron and Raisin, Mich.; Iroquois, Ill.; James, S. Dak.; Kalamazoo, Mich.; Kankakee, Ind. and Ill.; Little, branch of Red, Ark.; Little, branch of St. Francis, Ark.; Little Missouri, Ark.; Little Wabash, Ill.; Maple, Mich.; Marais de Cygnes, Mo. and Kans.; Maumee, Ohio and Ind.; Meramec, Mo.; Minnesota, Minn.; Mississinewa, Ind.; Muskegon, Mich.; Nebraska, Kans.; Ouachita, Ark. and La.; Osage, Mo. and Kans.; Pearl, Miss. and La.; Saline, Ark.; St. Joseph, Mich. and Ind.; Shell Rock, Iowa; South Skunk, Iowa; Tombigbee, Ala.; Tuscarawas, Ohio; White, West Fork, Ind.; and miscellaneous smaller streams.

2. Clinch, Tenn.; Duck, Tenn.; Iowa, Iowa; Sangamon, Ill.; and doubtless many creeks.

There are also probably a few mussel streams, especially in the South, which have not yet been surveyed.

The mussel fishery is pursued more or less actively in the following 19 States:

Mississippi River or westward: South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, and Texas.

Mississippi River or eastward: Minnesota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama.

Manufacturing States such as New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland are indirectly interested in the mussel fishery on account of having manufacturing industries based upon the shells received from the mussel streams. Thus at least one-half of the States have an immediate interest in the preservation of the mussel resources.

During my connection with the Bureau of Fisheries I had occasion to investigate the subject of the propagation of mussels with a view to conserving and improving the supply. I secured the services of two of the most eminent biologists in America, Dr. Lefever and Dr. Curtis, from the University of Missouri. These men, after a work which covered nearly two years, made a report to the Bureau of Fisheries, and, based upon that report, a recommendation was made to Congress asking an appropriation for the purpose of erecting a laboratory to make further investigation on those lines. Congress voted an appropriation; the laboratory was located 6 miles south of the town of Muscatine, in Iowa.

As a result of the investigations there it was found possible to replenish the depleted streams. The male and female mussel were placed together and means were found to save the supply. It was found that, under natural conditions, in the streams, when the female emitted her fertilized glocadiæ, in many instances they were lost in the mud. But it was found that by taking coarse fishes and placing them in tanks filled with the glocadiæ, great numbers of them adhered to the fins and tails of those fishes, and so were carried away and kept alive, and as they grew they would slough off from these fishes who had furnished them temporary traveling homes, and would then attach themselves to rocks and other hard substances in the water, and the future supply of the industry was in that way conserved and increased.

Previous to 1890 a German came to this country and located on a farm in Illinois. Three years later he started the first industry in this country for the manufacture of pearl buttons—in the State of Iowa. After many reverses he finally succeeded in establishing a successful plant. From that time until the present the pearl-button industry in this country has grown, until it employs from 20,000 to 30,000 people, and the last statistics, in 1914, with reference to this industry show that 20,000,000 gross of buttons were produced.

Prior to the war the pearl-button industry in this country competed with Austria. Since the war the Japanese, through their relations with China, have taken possession of the larger mussel beds in China, and have been enabled by reason of their low wages to get control of the market in this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. BOWERS. In addition to the people who are employed throughout this country in this industry, we must not forget to take into consideration those engaged in the hunting of pearls. These pearls consist not only of the better varieties but also of what are called the slugs and baroque pearls, which in these days are exceedingly valuable. Many people are engaged in the work of hunting these pearls in addition to those employed in the manufacture of buttons. Investigation shows that the wages paid to the pearl-button laborers in this country are just about ten times as much as those paid to the Japanese for similar work.

I believe this bill is right and meritorious. Probably we will be told by our friends on the other side that we have increased the duty 500 per cent. If I had it in my power, I would make it prohibitive. I believe in protecting this industry and its laborers by the broad shield of American law. I would make the pearl-button industry in this country supply the market here exclusively.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. AYRES. I understood the gentleman to say a while ago that there were pearl-button factories in Oklahoma and Kansas. Am I right about that?

Mr. BOWERS. I said that the mussel shells were found in those States. I am not positive as to the location of the factories. There has been quite an increase in their number during the past 10 years.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this bill to be a meritorious one. I joined with the majority members of the committee, and I hope the bill may pass the House unanimously. [Applause.]

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. The gentleman's statement has been very interesting. I would like to know what period of time elapses from the spawning or propagation of the young mussel until it has developed into a commercial shell. Does anyone know?

Mr. BOWERS. The supposition is that it takes three years, but it is a hard problem to solve as yet, because there has been no definite investigation along those lines. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL].

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SMITH of Idaho having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 29.

Resolved by the House (the Senate concurring), That a joint committee, to consist of five Senators and seven Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Vice President and the Speaker of the House, respectively, shall be named for the purpose of making arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War. That said committee shall report to the Senate and the House of Representatives such program and procedure therefor in its opinion shall be fitting and appropriate.

TARIFF ON PEARL BUTTONS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the industry for which we are asking protection is the pearl-button industry. The pearl-button industry in this country employs about 20,000 people and has an output of from five to ten million dollars every year. It has grown up in this country in the last 30 years under a wise protective law passed by Republicans. It has declined, since the Democratic Party came into power, through the passage of the Underwood tariff bill. It is active in about 25 States.

Previous to the introduction of this industry in this country buttons were imported largely from Europe, and they were made to some extent out of other material in this country, as they are to-day. There has never been and can not be a monopoly in this industry, either in raw material or the finished product. There are to-day from a dozen to a dozen and a half other kinds of buttons made in this country and in foreign countries that compete directly with the pearl button. But the pearl button is superior to all of them.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether it would be possible, in his opinion, without restricting the imports unduly, for this country to provide all the buttons necessary in the industry.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It certainly would. We can easily do it and would not have to increase the factory facilities that we have to-day. The industry to-day is not employing 50 per cent of its capacity. I think that will answer the gentleman's question.

Now, I want briefly to call your attention to how pearl buttons are produced. In the first place, they are the product of the clam shell. Clam shells are one of the most common things there are in this country. There is hardly any State but what you can go out and find clams, and most of you have done it when boys, and some of you dig them to-day.

Here is a clam and here is another one, showing you the different varieties. Here is one that I myself the other day dug up in the tidal basin. When I dug that clam I brought up half to a dozen pearl buttons, and could, if I had a few things necessary, produce from it pearl buttons that I might use.

You see here a card which illustrates practically the entire industry. Here is a clam shell. The clam shells are opened, spread apart, and then, with a tubular saw applied to the shell, blanks are produced. These blanks are similar to these here. There are blanks of different sizes taken out of the shell. The blank passes through different processes, one to another, and finally the holes for the thread are drilled in the button, and then the button is finished and polished.

Now, these processes may be done in a large factory or they may be done and are done in a very small factory.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman know how many persons are employed in gathering these mussels?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not exactly; but I think about 5,000 all told. That may be a little high, but that is one of the costs of the industry, the cost of labor in digging the shells. A great many men are employed doing this all over the country. There are a great many men employed in that way in Arkansas and Minnesota to-day, and it extends up and down the Mississippi River and practically all over the country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I want to ask the gentleman if the wages of these diggers have not been about doubled within the last year or so, and by reason of that the price of the shells greatly increased?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Of course, wages have advanced all over the country, and the price of shells has advanced because the price of the shells is the wage the man receives for digging the shells. He digs the shells and sells them; not all of them, because some men employ men to dig for their own factories; but not many of them do this.

Mr. VAILE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. Are the shells of the oyster used?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There is an ocean-pearl industry that competes with the fresh-water pearl, and it is a very great industry in Japan.

Mr. HUSTED. What percentage of the pearl buttons used in this country are produced here at the present time under this law?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think about 85 per cent, and it may be 90 per cent.

Mr. HUSTED. Produced in this country at the present time?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; but the industry is declining very fast.

Mr. HICKS. I notice that in the samples of shells on the board there there is no oyster shell. Are there any buttons made from oyster shells, which is the most prolific shell we have?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am not very well versed in that, but I think not. I think the oyster shell does not produce a good button. There are a great number of clam shells that will not make good buttons. There are certain kinds of shells that if you put them in a lake in Minnesota they will produce the best grade of buttons, but if you take them into another State and put them in other waters they will not produce good buttons.

Mr. HICKS. I notice that there are no salt-water clams among those shells there—what we call little-neck clams.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are not the little-neck clams. These are the fresh-water clam or mussel shells.

Mr. HICKS. They are not the eating clams?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. They are not the clams the gentleman eats; no. The mussels that these are produced from are fresh-water mussels. I want to demonstrate that the introduction of this industry into this country has not only been of great benefit to labor in this country, but that it has actually reduced the price of buttons. I am not going to take up a great deal of time in arguing the question, but I want to read to you from the Tariff Commission report to demonstrate that what I state is true. I want to call the attention of the gentlemen on the Democratic side to the Tariff Commission. This Tariff Commission was proposed by Woodrow Wilson, and it was to determine the facts and present them to Congress. I presume that at the time he had in mind that we had a condition just similar to this—at least the results indicate this.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Before the gentleman passes on to that, is there any difference in the kind of manufacture of buttons in the United States from the process abroad, or is it the same process practically?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Of course the Japanese manufacture at home a great many more of these buttons than we do in this country. They take them home and manufacture them in the homes and card them there.

Mr. RAKER. Then the real difference in the cost as between this country and abroad is the cost of putting the button in shape to use?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly not. The gentleman knows that the Japanese can go out and dig the mussels in the rivers and sell them for $20 a ton, where our men are getting $75 a ton.

Mr. RAKER. That is a question of production?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Then the difference in the price of the button to the consumer all relates to the difference in the cost of production abroad and in this country?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, yes, absolutely. The gentleman is correct about that. I understood the first question of the gentleman to refer to the finishing processes.

Mr. RAKER. The work of gathering the buttons and transporting the buttons to manufacturing establishments and the work of manufacturing them all goes into the question of production?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. So the labor question is the sole and only question involved?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The gentleman is absolutely right. I am glad that he called my attention to that. Practically 70 per cent of the selling price of these buttons is paid for labor to produce them.

It is a very high average, so that if labor is cheaper, as it is so much cheaper in Japan, we can not compete with it. They can get labor for practically 10, 15, and 20 per cent of what our people have to pay here. I am pleading the cause of the laboring man, not that of the manufacturer.

Mr. RAKER. Do the hearings before the committee, as well as those had before the Tariff Commission, show this relative difference in the cost of production of the button at home and abroad?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. That is what I was coming to. But I want the gentlemen on that side to understand that this Tariff Commission is not a Republican commission, but that it is a Democratic commission appointed by the Democratic President to bring out these facts. The facts that they brought out justified the conclusions which we have stated on the floor.

I want first to read from the report of the Tariff Commission. This is not a statement of any commercial organization, but this is the Democratic Tariff Commission's report about an industry in this country. I want to read to you first from page 21.

Mr. RICKETTS. Of the hearings?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; this is a report of the Tariff Commission. They had no hearings, but they investigated it, had scientific men investigate the industry, and then published the facts as they found them.

For the five years preceding 1890 the average yearly importation of pearl buttons into the United States amounted to about $1,500,000, but by 1891 the imports of all pearl buttons had decreased to $100,000. A United States consul, reporting from Austria-Hungary in 1898, stated that "the pearl-button industry in Austria-Hungary, which in former years occupied a flourishing place among the industries of the monarchy, has dwindled of late to such an insignificant figure that pearl buttons can no longer be considered one of the principal imports to the United States. This may be attributed to the development of the industry by the United States."

Further—

Despite the increased cost of raw material and labor in 1914, as compared with 1904, the price of fresh pearl buttons shows a considerable decrease.

That is exactly what we have always told you. Protect an industry and build it up and you lessen the cost to the consumer.

Mr. POU. Has there been a decrease in the selling price of pearl buttons?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly. That is what I just read to you out of your own Tariff Commission's report.

Mr. POU. I am asking the gentleman for facts. I am asking if there has been a decrease, and if so what the decrease is.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I could not tell the gentleman the exact figures, but it is quite a decrease. It says here in this Tariff Commission report that it shows a considerable decrease.

Mr. POU. Could the gentleman approximate in percentage?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think it is about 15 per cent, but I am not certain about that. Then it varies as to the grade of button. Certain grades decrease more than other grades.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I just want to answer the gentleman's question. If gentlemen will read the report, here is another thing: Using the census figures as a basis, the average price per gross in 1904 was 29.4. In 1914 the average price was 22.5, a decrease of 6.9 per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is 6.9 cents per gross, which would be somewhere over 20 per cent decrease.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not catch the gentleman's statement exactly. I think the gentleman makes the point that on account of encouraging the home industry and the multiplying of producers here that reduced the price from 29 cents in former years to 22 cents in 1914?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is what the Tariff Board says.

Mr. KITCHIN. So the gentleman does not attribute the low cost in 1914 to the Underwood tariff bill, does he?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly I do; and I want to call attention to another thing that this Tariff Board also reported. In regard to the industries having plenty of raw material—

It may be stated with assurance that the fresh-water mussel resources of the United States will endure indefinitely. They can, of course, be practically exhausted in any given locality, but only as the result of very shortsighted practices in the fishery. They could be seriously depleted over the country as a whole only by widespread and inexcusable negligence.

That will answer the question of monopoly in raw material.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. RAKER. It has been suggested that there has been a good deal of waste and destruction of these mussels. What is the status now? Are they scarce or plentiful?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Well, owing to the high cost of labor they are high, but there are plenty of them, and, as I think the gentleman from West Virginia explained to you, they are easily reproduced artificially.

Mr. RAKER. This is merely for information——

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes

Mr. RAKER. Is there any effort being made to have them reproduced?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, certainly. We have a great biological industry at Fairport, in Muscatine County, Iowa, for that very purpose of reproducing them and distributing them over this country. It is a very interesting study, and I wish I had time to explain how they do it; but I have not the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to have the gentleman have more time, because he seems familiar with the subject.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now, I want to read a little further from this Tariff Board's report:

The importance of the industry to the people at large rests only in part upon the fact that practically every individual in the country uses fresh-water pearl buttons. This class of buttons is, in fact, used about as universally as cotton. The significance of the industry to the public is based in large manner upon the fact that as fresh-water shell is the one abundant domestic material of the button manufacturer, and, apparently, the most abundant and readily available in the world, the price of all staple buttons to consumers has been greatly lowered in the development of this industry.

Notice that, gentlemen on the Democratic side.

Assuming, for example, that the mussel industry were abolished and no new satisfactory material discovered, it is obvious that the cost to the public in enhanced prices, due to the relatively limited quantities of other materials, would be much greater than the present value of the fresh-water pearl buttons consumed.

That is the Democratic Tariff Board. It is advising you in so many words that you had better not destroy an industry that to-day is producing buttons for less money than you formerly had to pay for them.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That is not a Democratic board; that is a nonpartisan board.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Their report on this industry is certainly a very fair one and indicates that they intend to be impartial and nonpartisan.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The law requires it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Now I want to read a little further about what they say about the Japanese industry—this same Democratic board:

During the last few years Japan has made remarkable progress in the manufacture of buttons from ocean pearl. The development of the industry is attributed mainly to the abundance of cheap raw material and the supply of cheap labor. This development started before the war, and trade has been stimulated by the opening of new markets to the Japanese product on account of the elimination of European competition.

Then it goes on to demonstrate by figures just how this Japanese industry has been developed and is developing to-day and is entering the markets of this country and is taking this market away from the American laborer. I want gentlemen on that side to get the report of their own Tariff Commission. They ought to have it and read it. Then I want to read a little about the wages over there, as given by this Tariff Board. These are the wages they get over there:

Five sailors at $8.50 per month.

Mr. KITCHIN. What page?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This is on page 80 of the Tariff Board's report. Now, how is a man going to compete with a wage scale like that? I would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he had better answer that.

Mr. O'CONNELL. What is the date of that report, please?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is very recent.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Is there a date on it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is 1918.

One tender at $20 per month, per year $240.
One diver (besides 8 per cent of shells taken by him), $10 per month, $120 per year.

It says, further:

Most of the divers are Japanese. They are paid from $10 to $20 per month and, in addition, from 8 to 10 per cent of the shells taken by them. In some instances owners pay $150 per ton for shells in addition to the rates. Others allow 10 cents extra for each shell. Still others allow $5 per picul (which is 139.44 pounds) for shells and 10 per cent for pearls, besides wages.

And it goes on and gives some further costs as to labor. There is not any question about the labor of Japan being very much cheaper than the labor of this country. I am going to give you something else which I want you to notice. This has not only the indorsement of your Tariff Commission, but it has the indorsement of your own administration.

I want to read to you from a letter of your own Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Redfield. He went out to Muscatine in the last two months and looked over this industry, and he wrote this letter. I want to read some of it to you, so that you will vote right on this question. I will put it all in the RECORD. If you do not vote right you are not in line with the administration; you are not in line with your Tariff Commission. This is the letter:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 12, 1919.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN: This department, through the Bureau of Fisheries, at the biological station located at Fairport, Iowa, is maintaining the supply of raw material for the pearl-button industry through the inoculation of fish in quantities with the microscopic parasites from which the fresh-water clams develop.

This cooperation with the industry has been highly appreciated. The manufacturers contributed to the purchase price of the property on which our laboratory is located, and it appears to be the case that without the assistance thus given by us the supply of fresh-water clam shells, on which the industry depends, would soon cease to exist and with it would go an industry of some importance.

Because of the mutual interest thus arising, I visited the biological laboratory at Fairport on the 1st instant, and then had a conference with the leading manufacturers of pearl buttons in Muscatine, Iowa, the center of the industry, and met also the producers of the machinery for the industry. It seems to be the fact that the industry is seriously threatened by Japanese competition. This is true in the cheaper grades of pearl buttons and has gone to such an extent that some of our leading manufacturers have abandoned the manufacture of the cheaper grades and are themselves purchasing the Japanese product, which they sell as jobbers. I saw these Japanese buttons in quantities in their storerooms. At the same time I also saw quantities of the cheaper grades of American-made buttons, for which there is no present sale in competition with the Japanese product. The present market for American-made pearl buttons is almost or quite wholly in the higher grades, including colored buttons and fancy designs.

The manufacturers told me that our duty upon the product was 45 per cent ad valorem, which is quite insufficient to affect materially the lower grades, but has, of course, more bearing on the higher-priced varieties.

There seems no doubt of the reality of the danger to the industry. Its substantial extinction has already taken place in the lower grades, where, as I have said, the American manufacturers have themselves become jobbers of the Japanese product.

We have undertaken here a study of several phases of the industry, which we think may be helpful. Among these are the development of a better market for the large amount of waste product. This is one of the industries in which as at present operated labor constitutes nearly or quite three-fourths of the cost, and a considerable proportion of the labor is hand labor in sorting and grading the product. It seems possible to develop a multiple cutter, so that the same amount of labor will produce many more button blanks than is now the case. This has been tried and failed in the past, but it seems possible to work it out to success. It seems practicable, also, to improve the methods of sorting and grading, so as to considerably reduce the amount of hand labor in those processes. Economies can apparently also be made in connection with packing.

It does not seem to me, however, from the brief study I was able to give the matter, that these economies can be made sufficient to overcome the difference in cost. It appears to be the case that the American product costs from four to five times as much as the Japanese, in the lower grades.

The subject is one, therefore, worthy of your careful thought. I inclose copies of Commerce Reports Nos. 29 and 49, in which articles bearing on this subject are marked, together with a statement of the buttons exported from Japan for 1915, 1916, and 1917. We will endeavor to get later figures if we can.

I venture to think that what is required is not so much an actual increase of the present duty so much as a modification of its form whereby a specific duty should be made to apply to the lower grades.

If we can assist in the matter, we beg you to command us.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary of Commerce.

Dr. F. W. TAUSSIG,
Chairman United States Tariff Commission,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. For how much lower does the Japanese button sell now in the market than these buttons of American make?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Just low enough to obtain the market. They do not cut under more than enough to sell. I want to answer another question that was asked here as to why the American manufacturer does not cut it down low enough to sell his product. The manufacturers can not produce buttons cheap enough to undersell the Japanese product.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. The gentleman is not able to give the figures showing the comparative price of Japanese buttons now sold as to the selling price?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are hundreds and hundreds of different kinds of buttons. It would take an expert to answer the gentleman's question. Here are Japanese buttons [exhibiting]. They are a cheaper grade of button. These are the kind of buttons largely that they are selling in this country to displace the American buttons, which are better, and like that [exhibiting], and put up in a better and more sanitary manner. I would like to answer the gentleman's question, but I can not do it in the time that is allotted to me. There is an American button right there [exhibiting]. It is a much better button than the Japanese button. You can not overcome the Japanese low price of labor. We have made buttons cheaper, but we have made them practically as cheap to-day as we can make them, and they are still coming in and still building up their industry in Japan and cutting under the market.

Now, this bill does not propose a high rate of duty. I hope every Republican will support this equitable tariff measure, so that we may keep up the American wage scale.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum, and I make the point——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. I want the gentlemen to hear the gentleman from North Carolina discuss this question, and I make the point there is no quorum present. They will hear something.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman makes the point of order and then scoots over to his office in the House Office Building, and when we try to get some business transacted over here he comes back again.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, if you Republicans want to keep a quorum here to do business, do it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Stay here and attend to business.

Mr. BLANTON. I am here all the time. I do not stay here when the roll is being called, but when business is transacted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be seated. The gentleman from Texas has a right to make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. It is my duty, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be seated. The point of order is not debatable, and the gentleman from Texas will not precede the making of a point of order with debate. He can not obtain the floor except by making the point of order. Following the point of order he may not debate. Hereafter when the gentleman from Texas desires to make a point of order he should rise and address the Chair and make the point of order that a quorum is not present. It is not debatable by him or by any other gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I quite agree with the distinguished Chairman, but is it in order for the chairman to impugn my motives or to abuse me on the floor of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was out of order. The point of order is not debatable by anybody. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and six gentlemen are present, a quorum. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed I want to brush aside the statements as to Japanese costs and wages made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], which apparently was sustained by his reading a portion of the report of the "Democratic Tariff Commission," so termed by the gentleman. He read from page 80 of the Tariff Commission report for the purpose of showing how low was the cost of production of pearl buttons in Japan. In order to be sure that I understood him correctly, I asked him a moment ago if that was the page from which he was reading. He said it was. Let me tell the gentlemen of the House that what he read does not refer to Japanese costs of production of pearl buttons at all. It has nothing to do with these shell buttons, known as fresh-water pearl buttons, that we are producing in this country, and for which protection is asked by the proponents of this bill. The quotation he read refers to ocean pearl, and it refers only to the cost of operating pearling boats in the waters of the Philippine Islands. Most of the divers of these boats are Japanese. The Tariff Commission does not undertake to verify or indorse even the statement as to such cost. It reports simply what is "said" to be the cost. No doubt those interested in the "protection" in this bill "claimed" to the commission such to be the costs of operating such boats.

I will say, too, that the gentleman did not even as to such costs read all the report says. Had he read the few lines immediately following his quotation he would have ascertained that in addition to the wages paid, to which he referred, the divers got a certain percentage of the shell taken, which amounts to far more than the specific wages.

So, gentlemen, do not be misled by the gentleman by such quoting by him "of evidence from the Democratic Tariff Commission's report." It has nothing to do with the cost of producing shell buttons in Japan, called by the trade "pearl" buttons.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. KITCHIN. I certainly will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have not the report of the Tariff Board before me, but if the gentleman will turn to page 25, the second paragraph, he will see the statement there.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; the statement of his colleague [Mr. HULL] is not there. I will not refer to that now, but I will refer to the speech and report of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] in a moment.

I think it is most appropriate for the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HULL, and for the other gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GREEN, to bring these shells in here and exhibit them, because this game they are trying to play on the rest of the Members of this House and on the country by this bill is a shell game pure and simple. [Laughter and applause.] I do not propose that they shall play that game unless the men who are going to help them play it know the facts. If they get stung, all right. [Laughter.] It will then be their fault and not mine. [Renewed laughter.]

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GREEN, is the author of this bill; that is, he introduced this bill. But he is not its real author. The rules of the House do not permit a man not a Member of Congress to introduce a bill; if they did, the manufacturers of pearl buttons in Muscatine, Iowa, in his district and State, or their attorney, would have introduced it. [Laughter.] But they did frame the bill. They told Mr. GREEN what to put into it, and told the Committee on Ways and Means what they wanted in it, and the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means put in exactly what they said they wanted in. [Laughter.] I said the manufacturers in actual fact conceived and dictated the preparation of the bill. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that the hired lawyer of the manufacturers supervised the framing of the bill. Let us see. Turn to Mr. F. M. Swacker's testimony given before our committee. He says he is counsel for the National Association of Pearl Button Manufacturers. What kind of a tariff and what rate did he want on pearl buttons? On page 16 of the hearings he expressed the wants and demands of the manufacturers, his clients. I quote from him:

Pearl buttons or parts of pearl buttons, finished or unfinished, 1½ cents per line per gross and, in addition thereto, 15 per cent ad valorem.

And into this bill, fathered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] went the identical demand of this hired lawyer. Let me read from the bill:

Buttons of shell or pearl, finished or partly finished, 1½ cents per line per gross and, in addition thereto, 15 per cent ad valorem.

[Laughter.]

The same old way all Republican tariff bills are written.

But Judge GREEN and the Republicans on the committee are entitled to great credit for credulity in believing that this hired lawyer knew exactly how to write the right kind of a tariff bill and the right tariff rate to protect the industry in his district and his State. [Laughter.] Judge GREEN has made a most magnificent fight, and so has Mr. HULL, for the pearl-button industry, "to save the industry" in their State and districts. He has made a splendid, magnificent speech in advocacy of it. He has made a splendid report in behalf of the majority of the committee. He has the distinction of being the first and only man since the beginning of the Government who has made a pearl-button speech in Congress. I recall when I was a boy—and all of us recall—that there was a distinguished gentleman, a Member of Congress, by the name of Judge William D. Kelley, who, for his able championship of a high-tariff on pig iron, became known throughout the length and breadth of this country as "Pig Iron Kelley," and he deserved that distinction. [Applause.] His biographer states that he was so well known in the United States as "Pig Iron Kelley" that a letter addressed simply to the "Hon. Pig Iron" would seek him out wherever he was in the United States and be delivered to him. [Laughter.]

Now, the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] deserves and is entitled to be hereafter known as "Pearl Button Green." [Laughter.] It is an honor which, if I were in his place and a high protectionist, as he is, and representing his district, perhaps, I would carry with much pride; and I am just as sure, after this bill is passed and the people throughout the country read his able speech and his splendid report on this bill, that if a letter should be addressed to the "Hon. Pearl Button," it will be promptly delivered to him. [Laughter.] There will be no need hereafter in having people address him as "Hon. WILLIAM RAYMOND GREEN, of Council Bluffs, Iowa." "Hon. Pearl Button," will be all sufficient, and it will go right straight to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. VAILE. I might suggest to the gentleman that it would not only help me in my district, but elsewhere, if I were to be known as "Tungsten Vaile."

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, you did not know enough about tungsten to deserve that name. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. As these Japanese pearl buttons are so cheap, would it not save time and expense just to sew a pearl button on the envelope? Would not that reach Judge GREEN just the same? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I think on account of his great services, as I said before—and as I shall show before I get through—in raising the tariff duty somewhere from 150 to over 500 per cent ad valorem, his Muscatine friends can afford to furnish him American-made buttons free. [Laughter.] There is no use in making the author of this bill patronize a Japanese industry to the injury of an American industry even for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARAWAY. Why not put on a shell?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would be unreasonable to expect that. It would not be so honorable to put on a shell. It would advertise the game he is playing. [Laughter.]

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. I would inquire of the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina whether Judge William D. Kelley, of Pennsylvania, was not in his day one of the ablest and most distinguished and most scholarly Members of this House?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and so is my distinguished friend, Judge GREEN, of Iowa. [Laughter.] But the name "Hon. Pearl Button" will add to his distinction. [Laughter.] I think he now has the degree of LL. D., conferred by a great university. Now, by his able championship of the pearl-button tariff, the manufacturers of pearl buttons are going to confer on him the additional degree of "P. B." [Laughter.]

I want to pay the gentleman from Iowa a compliment by saying that he knows more about——

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman say whether or not that distinguished man, a Member of this body, known as "Pig Iron Kelley," was not to a very great degree the father of the enormous business in iron and steel that is now such a distinguishing feature of the vast business of the United States?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. OSBORNE. I think the gentleman is wrong about that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Judge Kelley was the most persistent talker on pig-iron tariff in Congress, but long before he became an advocate of a protective tariff, while he was making free-trade speeches in Boston, there were many distinguished men in Pennsylvania and elsewhere advocating a protective tariff on pig iron and iron and steel products. In fact, before his advocacy of a protective tariff there had been a protective tariff on iron and steel.

Judge Kelley started out a staunch free trader, but years afterwards, on his return to Pennsylvania, he changed his views on the tariff and became an advocate of a high protective tariff and a very able and effective one.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not possible that Judge Kelley saw the error of his way?

Mr. KITCHIN. Probably so, in his judgment; and if you are just as honest as Judge Kelley was when we get through with the discussion of this bill you will see the error of your ways and vote with me against this bill. [Laughter.]

As I started to say a while ago, I pay the tribute to Judge GREEN of Iowa, the author of this bill and the author of this report and the author of the splendid speech that we heard this afternoon of saying that he knows more about the shell or pearl-button industry in this country, more about the pearl-button tariff rates, more about what they ought to be from the manufacturers' viewpoint, and more about all things in connection with the pearl-button industry here and abroad than any Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, than any Republican in this House or in this Capitol, or any Republican in the United States. Here is his report. Understand, he knows more about it, he knows more facts in connection with the pearl-button industry and the labor cost here and the labor cost abroad, he understands the provisions of this bill better than any Republican living to-day; and I am going to show you how much he knows about this subject. Then I will let you judge how much the other Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee and in this House and in this country know. [Laughter.] All right. We start out with his report, filed in behalf of the majority of the committee. In the very first sentence, in its statement of facts we read:

The pearl-button industry employs from 20,000 to 30,000 people.

Where did he get that from? I will tell you. He got it from Mr. Swacker, the paid lawyer of the National Button Manufacturers' Association. Look at this report of the Tariff Commission and you will see where he has missed it by from 5,000 to 10,000 people. Why, he even included all the fishermen. Mr. HULL of Iowa said there were about 5,000 people engaged in the shell-gathering industry.

The Tariff Commission reports 10,331, including shoremen, in the shell-pearl fishing business. But all of those who are in the shellfish business are not engaged in it primarily for pearl or shell buttons. Many of them are engaged in it for other purposes. The report of the Tariff Commission shows that even including the fishermen there are less than 19,000 men in the pearl-button industry. So Judge GREEN misses it by several thousand people. That is the first sentence of the report. Of course Judge GREEN thought it was a fact. He had reason to believe it was a fact. He had the best reason from a Republican protective-tariff standpoint in the world to believe that it was a fact. The hired lawyer of these corporate gentlemen who want to get their hands into the pockets of the people told him that was the fact. This paid lawyer in his testimony says that in this industry there are over 20,000, and in his opinion 30,000 people. He told Judge GREEN that, and, of course, from a Republican standpoint Judge GREEN had the right to believe that the hired lawyer of these beneficiaries told the truth. He thought there was no use for him to investigate to see whether that lawyer stated the facts. When he heard and read what that lawyer said he took it as gospel truth. But, you know, I have been a lawyer myself, and I know how lawyers talk for their clients sometimes. When I was appearing for possibly the guiltiest man I would represent him and in my enthusiasm for my client would talk like he was the most innocent man in the world. This is hired lawyer like.

Mr. KNUTSON. I believe you would.

Mr. KITCHIN. So from my own experience I doubt the testimony of hired lawyers as to the real, exact facts every time, and therefore after I read that lawyer's testimony I made some investigation and I found that that lawyer enlarged the number of people employed by from 5,000 to 10,000. I do not blame Judge GREEN about this. He did what all Republican authors of tariff bills do—take the word of the beneficiaries and their lawyers; but the lawyer knew that in order to fool some few Democrats and all the Republicans, his clients had to make you think this was a great big industry employing 25,000 or 30,000 people—men and women, working day by day for a livelihood—and that by their labor they were supporting families of 100,000 or more and they had him to play it up big in order to fool somebody into voting for this high, extortionate, excessive tariff. Let us see in how ridiculous a light that paid lawyer has put the author of this bill and the Republican majority of the committee. I know Judge GREEN is man enough and honest enough that when he finds out he is mistaken he will get up and apologize, and when he finds he is wrong about this bill he will get up and vote against it. I know he will do that. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman spoke of having practiced law and of having tried to make black white and white black——

Mr. KITCHIN. That was only when I was appearing for a fellow like you. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Is the gentleman appearing for the Japanese pearl-button industry now?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I am appearing now for the Government and the people.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] a few minutes ago said he was always on the floor when there was anything of importance going on.

Mr. BLANTON. He is right here now. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I thought the gentleman was asleep and I wanted to wake him up.

Mr. BLANTON. I am right here and I am wide awake. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Michigan knows that I would not have proceeded to talk unless the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] was present. [Laughter.] I knew the gentleman from Texas was standing in the doorway.

Now, let us get back to the number of people employed in the industry and see how inaccurate this report is. Judge GREEN and the majority of the committee took what the lawyer said. I want him to listen very particularly to what I shall say, and I ask the House also to listen. The whole selling value, including the total cost of all the pearl or shell buttons made in the United States in one year, labor cost, overhead charges, depreciation of the plant, profits—and they make good profits—amount to a little less than $10,000,000 a year.

The testimony of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] before the committee was that it was "something like $10,000,000 per annum." Judge GREEN, in the report, says the average daily wage paid the labor is now $4.40. Taking 25,000 employees as the average "between 20,000 and 30,000 people employed," which, he says, are in the industry, at $4.40 a day, it would require $33,000,000 a year to pay the employees—over three times as much as the total selling value of all the shell or pearl buttons made in the United States a year. According to Judge GREEN'S figures as to the number of people in the industry and the average daily wage paid, the industry, after exhausting the whole selling value of its product, lacks $23,000,000 a year having enough to pay its labor. I would like for Judge GREEN to tell us where the industry, whose total investment is less than $4,000,000, gets that extra $23,000,000 to pay its employees with. This shows how absurd is the claim in this report that "the industry employs from 20,000 to 30,000 people" and that "the average wage is $4.40" a day.

Even if they paid the labor $2 a day, it would be $15,000,000 for the labor alone, $5,000,000 more than the selling value of all the shell and pearl buttons made in the United States, with the imported Japanese pearl buttons thrown in for good measure.

But the manufacturers and their lawyer must make such absurd claims to fool Judge GREEN and the Republicans on the committee, and Judge GREEN must repeat them in the report to induce the House to vote for his bill. But Judge GREEN knows more about the pearl-button industry in the United States and in Japan, how many men are employed, what wage they get, and every other detail of the industry, than any Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, or any Republican in this House, or any Republican in the United States! [Laughter.]

Let us go to the next sentence of his report. It reads:

In 1914 twenty million gross of buttons were produced, valued at $4,879,844.

While that is an untrue statement, it seems a harmless little statement; but do you know that there is a tariff point in that? You see, that is the calendar year of 1914. The Underwood Act had its first year's operation in 1914. He wanted to show by this that as the Underwood Act had reduced the tariff duty on pearl buttons, a very few and at a very low value were produced that year, while the statistics would show a larger production and a higher value under the Payne Act for 1913 and 1912.

But this statement in the report is absolutely untrue. They say that we must take as true the report of the Tariff Commission. I don't, but all right, take this then. Turn, my distinguished friend, Judge GREEN, to page 1, of the Tariff Board report and you will read this:

A great variety of materials entered into the manufacture of many grades and styles of buttons produced. Those made of pearl (or of shell) constituted the product of chief value. The 26,181,405 gross of such buttons, valued at $7,369,208, represented 35 per cent of the value of the total production of buttons.

The commission states that these statistics "relate to the year 1914."

So instead of producing under the Underwood Act in 1914 20,000,000 gross, valued at $4,784,000, according to Judge GREEN'S report, there were produced, according to the Tariff Commission's report 26,181,405 gross, valued at $7,369,208.

Let us proceed further with this remarkable report.

Listen to this:

The prices are now somewhat higher——

Not lower now, than they were under the Payne-Aldrich Act, as my friend, Mr. HULL of Iowa, would in his speech a few moments ago have you believe. The prices are somewhat higher now—owing to the fact that the cost of shells has advanced to about 100 per cent, and wages in the button factories increased 93½ per cent over the wages of 1913.

Who told Judge Green that? Did the Tariff Board? Oh, no. Who told him? Why, this same hired lawyer, Mr. Swacker. [Laughter.] Turn to his testimony on page 11, and you will read:

We have experienced about 93½ per cent increase in the manufacturing cost and 100 per cent increase in the shell cost.

And so forth. And Judge GREEN puts that in his report as gospel truth. And again the lawyer fooled him. He knew how to fool Judge GREEN and the Republican committee into the belief that he was absolutely accurate. Instead of saying 92 per cent or 94 per cent, or about 100 per cent, he wanted them to know that he had figured it down to a fine point, that he did not want to miss the actual increase in cost even by a fraction of a cent. So he had figured and figured, and the exact amount to a fraction was 93½ per cent. Of course, by being so exact, even to a fraction of a cent, Judge GREEN and the committee thought the lawyer was absolutely correct; if he had not been correct he would never have taken the time to figure it out and bring it down to a half cent. Oh, yes; the lawyer was telling the truth! And into the report it went. "Wages," says his report, "in the button factories increased 93½ per cent." What does the Tariff Commission report show? I will ask Judge GREEN to turn to page 17 of the Tariff Commission's report and he will read this:

A general advance in wages from 25 to 60 per cent in the various branches of the button industry has added to the cost of production.

A "heap of difference," Judge, between the Tariff Commission and Lawyer Swacker; a "heap of difference" between your report and the commission's report, and a "heap of difference" between "93½" and "from 25 to 60 per cent." I doubt if Swacker ever saw one of these factories in his life. I presume he said to the manufacturers, "How much do you want me to get," and they told him, "Make the facts to fit the case," and he got it. For a real, good prohibitive tariff rate, such as this bill contains, the lawyer slipped up on American wages. He did not put the wages high enough for Judge GREEN and the Republican members of the committee. Judge GREEN knew that it would not do to put the lawyer's figures on the wage rate. It must be higher. The higher the wage rate, the higher the tariff rate he could make and the more easily the committee could put the bill across in the House. The lawyer said that the average wage rate that they were paying now was from $2.50 to $3 per day. That is the testimony on page 7, and to be sure he meant that he repeats it on page 17. Mr. Willis, page 34, testified that wages here were from $2.50 to $4.22 per day. Mr. Willis is a large manufacturer of pearl buttons in the State of my distinguished friend, Judge GREEN. Mr. Lemaire, another manufacturer of the State of my good friend, on page 59, says that the wages here were from "about $2.50" to "about $4" a day. But Judge GREEN in his report puts it at $4.40 a day.

Nobody says $4.40 but Judge Green. They could not fool him in that. He knew it was higher than they said. He knew the manufacturers who paid off that labor every week and every day did not know what they were talking about, and he knew that Mr. Willis, of his own State, one of the biggest button manufacturers of the country, did not know what he was talking about, and Mr. Lemaire, another manufacturer, did not know what he was talking about, and that the hired lawyer of the manufacturers did not know what he was talking about. But Judge Green knew all about it. So he puts it right. He has it $4.40, so that they can whoop it up to the "boys" in the House to put this high tariff on in order to keep up the high wages.

I will give Judge GREEN $100, or a card of real pearl buttons, made from the pearls from the bottom of the ocean, bigger and brighter than any of these before us, if he will show me on what page of the commission's report or on what page of the hearings anybody said the average wage of labor in the button plants here was $4.40. I challenge the Judge to point to one line or one word of testimony anywhere in the hearings or in the Tariff Board's report sustaining his statement.

Now, the Judge stands a sure showing of getting out of me $100 or a card of real pearl by pointing to any page in that commission's or any page of the hearings report wherein it is stated that the average daily wage here is $4.40. My $100 is waiting. Oh, no; he can not do it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will take great pleasure in doing that when the gentleman gets through.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman know? If he wants to get the pearl buttons or $100, what is the page?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Wait until you get through.

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait? You have the report of the hearings there before you. Tell me now and get my money. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to admonish the gentlemen to address each other in parliamentary form.

Mr. KITCHIN. The Chair is exactly right. Certainly he is right; I owe the Chair an apology by following the bad example of these Republicans so much in violating rules like that, but I will do so no more. [Laughter.] But it is perfectly parliamentary for me to stand here and wait until the distinguished gentleman, the distinguished author of this bill, shall point out to me the page in all the testimony on which I can find that anybody said the average labor wage was $4.40 a day. Is not that parliamentary? [Laughter.] But the gentleman can not do it. I hate to ask such a hard question, but they have put up such a hard bill. Now, gentlemen, let us see about the Japanese wages. The Tariff Board does not know anything about the Japanese cost or wages, and neither does Judge GREEN. They want to scare us about the Japanese wages. Let us see what confusion these manufacturers and the hired lawyer and Judge GREEN get us into when they begin to talk of the wages in Japan.

Mr. Swacker, the lawyer, says workmen in the Japanese button industry are paid 14 and 14½ cents a day while we pay from $2.50 to $3.

He puts our wages here over 25 times higher than the wages in Japan. He wanted to make a good, clinching case.

Mr. Willis, one of our pearl-button manufacturers, said he had been over to Japan; that he had imported some blanks and buttons from Japan; and that labor wage there in the pearl-button industry was about 26 cents a day.

Mr. Lemaire, another manufacturer, said that wages in the industry in Japan was from 30 to 40 cents a day. Judge GREEN, in his report, says that the average wage of the Japanese workers in the industry is 42 cents and thirty-nine one hundredth of a cent. Judge GREEN has got the Swacker habit of figuring things down to a fine point. He is from 20 to 200 per cent higher than the witnesses. But he attempts to keep up the proportion by putting the wages here much higher than they did.

I almost made up my mind that on his report I would vote for Judge GREEN's bill. When I first read it I said that it was such a good report and Mr. GREEN was such a good man, I believed I would vote for it. Then it occurred to me, however, that it was better first to look into these things and ascertain the actual facts and vote according to the facts as they exist. I found the facts as far apart from Judge GREEN's report as the two poles are from each other.

Let us analyze the report further. We read:

A significant fact—

Now, notice the words "significant fact."

A significant fact is that it appeared from the hearings that the Japanese manufacturers could make the pearl buttons entire and put them on cards for a little less than the American manufacturer could have them sewed on the card.

It appeared, says his report, from the hearings that the Japanese could make the buttons entire and put them on cards for a little less than our manufacturers up in Iowa could get a girl or somebody to sew them on the card.

I want again to make the same pearl-button or $100 offer to my distinguished and amiable friend from Iowa. Point to one line of evidence in all the hearings or Tariff Commission's report that will sustain that statement and I will make good my offer.

"A significant fact," says this distinguished gentleman, who knows more about the pearl-button industry and the tariff it needs than any Republican, that these Japanese manufacturers make pearl buttons and put them on cards for less than the Americans can put them on the card! Even Lawyer Swacker did not go that far. He never said such a thing. The manufacturer did not say that. If the lawyer said that, if one of these manufacturers said it, or anybody else said it, just let the Judge point out to me on what page of the hearings I will find such testimony. I will tell you what misled Judge GREEN. He got the evidence all mixed up in his mind. Knowing Judge GREEN as well as I do, I can not believe he would have written that report unless somebody had taken advantage of him. [Laughter.] Sometimes I am indignant when I read that report—indignant against the man who so misled Judge GREEN into writing that report. The Judge knows, and his Republican colleagues on the committee know, that I like him too well to sit still and see anybody impose on him in that way. [Laughter.]

If you will turn to page 8 of the hearings, you will see the testimony upon which this part of the report is based, and that it differs widely from the report. As a matter of justice, it is due the author of the report that I should read it. I want to ask unanimous consent later on that he may be permitted to withdraw from the files of the House this report, and file another one in its place, after hearing my speech. [Laughter.]

Now, if Judge GREEN will just turn to page 8 he will find that he failed to recall correctly the lawyer's testimony. The lawyer testified:

During 1917 and 1918 some Japanese buttons of an inferior quality, sewn on cards, were imported and sold at the following prices per gross:

	Light.	Dark.
1917.	Cents.	Cents.
16-line	.06½	.05½
18-line	.07½	.06½
1918.
16-line	.07	.06
20-line	.09	.08

Those buttons are sewn on cards and those prices are slightly more than it would cost us in this country to card and box the buttons, for that operation alone.

Mr. GREEN. Just to put them on the card and in the box?

Mr. SWACKER. Yes, sir; the cost of the cards and boxes. The whole selling price of the Japanese buttons is but a little more, maybe 1 cent a gross, than the cost after our button is finished for carding and boxing it and preparing it for market.

Those "some Japanese buttons of inferior quality," referred to by the lawyer, are made, sewn on cards, and imported for "slightly more," says the lawyer, than it cost here "for carding, boxing, and preparing for market," and not as Judge GREEN's report has it, that the Japanese button cost to make and card a "little less" than it costs here to simply sew the button on the card. But it is hard for a Republican author of a tariff bill report to distinguish between "more" and "less." [Laughter.]

Judge GREEN says, "Just to put them on the card and in the box?" Mr. Swacker says, "Yes, sir; the cost of the cards and box, and preparing for the market."

But to make out a tiptop case for a high prohibitive tariff bill, Judge GREEN has all Japanese buttons coming in at a "little less" than the cost here of sewing them on the card. But the lawyer said only "some Japanese buttons of inferior quality came in 1917 and 1918." I will show you in a moment what "some" means. He said the price for these "inferior" buttons was a little "more" than what it costs here to have the buttons sewn on the card, to pay for the card, to pay for the box, and put them in the box, and prepare them for the market.

Let me repeat, in the light of the lawyer's testimony, what the judge says in his report:

A significant fact is that it appeared from the hearings that the Japanese manufacturers could make the buttons entire and put them on cards for a little less than the American manufacturers could have them sewn on the card after they had been made.

I declare! [Laughter.] It is not in order now to move an amendment to fit the report to the evidence and the facts, but Judge GREEN will no doubt do it later. [Renewed laughter.]

The lawyer made as strong a case as he could by stating that only "some Japanese buttons of inferior quality" came in at certain low prices in 1917 and 1918. But Judge GREEN did not make any qualification. How large a quantity involved in that "some" do you suppose was imported? Less than one-half of 1 per cent. That is, if they sent over here 100 gross of buttons, it would be less than one-half of a gross. If Judge GREEN can cite any testimony to the contrary or any testimony that will sustain his statement, I will vote for his bill. Judge GREEN and Lawyer Swacker and his clients, the manufacturers, to get this bill through the House would have the House, and especially the Republicans, believe that the buttons imported from Japan are selling at 5, 6, 7, and 8 cents per gross. In fact, Mr. Swacker says the "basic cost" of Japanese buttons is 7 cents.

Why gentlemen, let us see how far from the facts they are. If Judge GREEN, or Lawyer Swacker, or his clients had simply taken the statistics of the value of the imports contained in the report of the Department of Commerce or of the Tariff Commission report, or even as given in the table of statistics filed by the lawyer himself, they would have found that the average price of imported pearl buttons in the year 1918 was over 20 cents, and this without freight, commission, or the present tariff duty charges. The average import price or cost, without freight, duty, or commissions, for the 11 months ending May 31, this year, was 22½ cents. That was the price in Japan or other foreign country from which imported, and in order to sell them over here the importer must in addition pay the freight, a 45 per cent duty, and then add his profits or commissions. The 45 per cent duty alone, without freight or commissions, added to the 22½ cents would make over 32½ cents per gross. There might have been a few gross of imperfect, "inferior quality" buttons sold here for less than that. Our factories make, also, imperfect, "inferior quality" buttons, and one witness, Lawyer Swacker, testified that they sold them for one-fourth or one-fifth of their cost. But, as I said, the average import price or cost of the imported buttons, without duty or freight or commissions, for the 11 months ending May 31, 1919, as they left Japan or other foreign country was 22½ cents per gross.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; I was just remarking to some of these gentlemen here that you would have to vote for the bill, because I will show you that you are entirely wrong.

Mr. KITCHIN. Point it out now. Give me a chance at it right now. I have the report of the Tariff Commission and the hearings right here. Tell me now where is the evidence or statement that refute what I have stated? The average import price of the buttons in Japan and other foreign countries from which imported in May this year was 28¼ cents per gross. May was the last month for which the report of the Department of Commerce gives the statistics. Now, the present duty of 45 per cent on 28¼ cents is a fraction over 12 cents, making the cost of the imported button here, without freight or commission, 40½ cents per gross. Add the commission and the freight and the cost of preparing them for market here, and the selling price will be over 45 cents here. And yet the manufacturers and their lawyer and Judge GREEN and the Republican members of the committee would have the House believe and have the country believe that this bill is absolutely necessary to protect the American button industry against the 5 and 7 and 8 cent "Japanese button that is flooding the American market and shutting down the American factories." All right, does Judge GREEN deny that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer you when the time comes.

Mr. KITCHIN. This is the time if we want to get the truth about the matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will show that hardly a statement that the gentleman made here is correct.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now is the time. The gentleman can not by the evidence dispute my statements. I have quoted correctly from the testimony. I have cited the pages both of the hearings and Tariff Commission report. I have quoted his report. I have cited figures from the report of the Department of Commerce, from its latest report.

Now, let us proceed with Judge GREEN's report. Here is something fine. They want to show you how American buttons are lying on the shelves of American factories and how these factories are shut down because of the "flooding of our markets by the 5 and 7 and 8 cent Japanese buttons." Is this Judge GREEN's report? Somebody may have "fudged" a bogus report on me. Am I reading from the right report?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is my report. [Applause.] I am sorry that the gentleman is not able to get that through his head.

Mr. KITCHIN. I did not know for certain whether somebody had fooled me or not. I thought I had been reading from the gentleman's report.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the gentleman is standing up here and misleading the House right along.

Mr. KITCHIN. By reading from the gentleman's report. Well, all right. You know if it can be made to appear that the buttons of our factories are piling up on their shelves for lack of sales on account of the Japanese pearl-button flood, and this has been going on for a year or two, some of these Democrats might be fooled into voting for this tariff bill, and all the Republicans will. But I am going to show you what the fact is, and show you how far it is from the Judge's report. I wish Judge GREEN would take his report and keep up with me as I read it. Turn to page 2 of the report and begin at line 3. But before I get to the piling up of buttons "on the shelves" of the factories here let me refer to the "Japanese competition" referred to in the report. Now, Judge, see if I read this right:

The result of the Japanese competition has been virtually to put the American manufacturers out of the market.

Why, all the imports of the pearl or shell buttons from Japan and of the entire world is less than 10 per cent of what the American people are buying and using. The manufacturers of such buttons here are selling 90 per cent of the whole market and the balance of the world only 10 per cent. In other words, every hundred dollars worth of pearl and shell buttons that the people buy and use in this country $90 worth is American-made buttons; only $10 worth is foreign made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has occupied one hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the Chair has called my attention to that fact, but I believe I am credited with 30 minutes more, under the arrangement with the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

The American manufacturers take 90 per cent of the whole button industry trade in this country. I will put a common-sense illustration. Suppose I am a merchant selling shoes in the city of Washington, and the shoe merchants of Baltimore, of Philadelphia, of New York, and all other American cities are competing with me. I put up the claim that the Baltimore merchants and merchants of the other cities are coming into such competition with me that they are ruining me by taking the whole market from me. I begin to clamor for protection against them. Suppose upon looking into the matter and getting the facts it is found that out of every $100 worth of shoes sold to the people in Washington I sell $90, and all of Baltimore, all of New York, all of Philadelphia, all of the balance of the country sell only $10. Why, you would say to me, "KITCHIN, you are either the biggest fool or the biggest liar in the world. Do you not know that when you have 90 per cent of all the trade you need not be scared of Baltimore and the rest of the country, and you can not as an honest man say that the Baltimore and other merchants are driving you out of the market and ruining your business in the city of Washington."

That is the case of this bill right here. Is not that so, Judge GREEN? That is so, Judge; that is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman at the proper time.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. If the gentleman has any information on the subject, will he kindly give it to us as to the profits made by the Americans who furnish our pearl buttons with the Japanese competition. I happen to know that in my own town a very snug little concern which was manufacturing fresh-water pearl buttons successfully has been absolutely driven out of business by the competition, and the concern closed up.

Mr. KITCHIN. When?

Mr. HUSTED. Within the last three years.

Mr. KITCHIN. So the gentleman from New York has a little industry in his own State?

Mr. HUSTED. No; it used to be there. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. And it went out how long ago?

Mr. HUSTED. It closed up three years ago; they could not make any money and could not continue the business.

Mr. KITCHIN. How many years was it in the business?

Mr. HUSTED. It started along under the old law, and got along very well under the Underwood tariff bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I wish the gentleman knew a little more about that industry. It closed down, he says, in 1916 after being in the business three years. If there was a pearl-button industry in the United States that had been in business two or three years before 1916 and it went out of business in 1916, it was not the Japanese competition, but because that business was run by a set of incompetents. Why, Judge GREEN, and every man who knows anything about the industry, knows that in 1916 and 1915 the industry was doing better than it ever did. They complain of Japanese importations in 1917 and 1918 and this year. Not in 1916 or 1915 or 1914. Mr. Swacker, the lawyer, tells us that the "flood" came in 1917 and 1918, but that even during that time and since the pearl-button industry throughout the country has been making over 11 per cent net profit, after deducting all cost, depreciation, taxes, overhead charges, and everything.

Now let us read the report about the vast "accumulations on the shelves of American factories:

> Their goods have accumulated on the shelves until it is estimated that they have a two years' supply.

If Judge GREEN can point out one single line or word in the evidence, in the hearings, in the Tariff Commission's report, that will sustain such a statement, that will sustain it by one-half or by one-third or by one-fourth, I will vote for this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I did not hear that statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the gentleman ought to listen to his own report, because it ought to sound good to him. In the gentleman's report it is stated that "their goods have accumulated on the shelves until it is estimated that they have a two years' supply." I was saying that I would vote for the gentleman's bill——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, the gentleman will have to vote for it.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has the hearings before him—right in his hand—and he has also the Tariff Commission's report, and if he will show me one line or one word in the hearings, or in the commission's report that will corroborate that statement even by one-third or one-fourth, I will vote for the bill. Nobody but the Judge made that estimate, so far as I can find. Mr. Swacker, the lawyer, goes just as far as a lawyer's conscience will permit him to go, and he said there were only 13,000,000 gross of buttons on the shelves, but the gentleman's report has it over 60,000,000. How much has been the production in the last two or three years? A little over 30,000,000 gross a year. They were producing 26,181,000 gross under the Underwood Act in 1914. They now have increased to over 30,000,000. We are exporting pearl buttons; we are large exporters of all kinds of buttons; we are exporting in competition with Japan and all the world. The lawyer only had 13,000,000 "on the shelves." We are making over 30,000,000 a year. The gentleman's report has "on the shelves" a two-years' supply. That would make over 60,000,000 gross "on the shelves," would it not? It is awful! Yet they must have this 150 to over 500 per cent ad valorem tariff contained in this bill, because they have "a two-years' supply," or more than 60,000,000 piled on the shelves. As the Judge is "sort of" disputing my statements, I reckon I might as well give him the page.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not yield until I give him the page. If the Judge will turn to page 12 he will find that they had only 13,000,000 "accumulated on the shelves," according to the lawyer, who was making it just as large as he could; but the Judge goes him four and a half times better—400 per cent more. Now, let Judge GREEN tell this House candidly when he comes to tell how much I have misled it, who estimated 60,000,000, who estimated for him the two years' supply. I will ask you to tell right now—I beg the Chair's pardon; I ought not to speak in the second person; but I ask the gentleman from Iowa, the distinguished author of this bill and of this report, to tell now who estimated "the two years' supply"? Where is the evidence? Was it not simply the imagination of the distinguished gentleman himself? It is not a "two-years' supply." It is just 13,000,000—not an unreasonable supply to have on hand at any one time. I think I have discussed all the "statements of facts" in the report.

Neither Judge GREEN nor any Republican member of the committee understands what the peculiar kind of rates in this bill mean. Does it surprise you, gentlemen, to tell you that? Let me call the attention of the House to some interesting portions of the testimony as to the meaning or import of the rates.

I am going to show you that the Judge himself was astounded when Lawyer Swacker attempted to explain these rates. He could not believe they would amount to such a marvelous ad valorem equivalent.

Before the introduction of this bill this lawyer and his clients, the manufacturers, came down here and told the Republicans of the committee to put on a duty of "a cent and a half per line per gross, plus 15 per cent ad valorem." That was Hebrew and Greek mixed to every Republican on the committee. They had no idea what that meant. When they began they did not know, when they finished they did not know, and they do not know now. Judge GREEN was surprised almost "out of his boots" when Lawyer Swacker told the committee that on some buttons that rate—the very rate now in the bill—would amount to 300 or 350 per cent ad valorem. He could have told them in truth that on some it would amount to 500 per cent.

The distinguished gentleman from Iowa will please turn to pages 22 and 23 of the hearings and see if I quote him and Lawyer Swacker correctly and construe him correctly.

Judge HULL, of Tennessee, asked Mr. Swacker, with reference to the ad valorem equivalent of the specific rate:

> What would be the ad valorem equivalent of the specific in round figures? If you were to put on a specific rate which would equal the difference of the labor cost in Japan and here, assuming that in Japan it would be one-fourth of what it is here, the effect of that specific rate would be the equivalent of an ad valorem of 75 per cent, would it not?
> Mr. SWACKER. No; of several hundred per cent. It would be, anyway, 300 per cent, because the difference is the difference between 25 and 100; three times 25 would be 75; and to make it up to the 100 it would not be 75 but it would be 300 per cent.

Mr. HULL further asked, "So you would want a rate of 300 per cent in order to equalize your labor cost?" "Yes," says this lawyer.

Judge GREEN was absolutely astonished that the bill he was to introduce would give a duty the equivalent of 300 per cent ad valorem and could not believe it. So he at once said to the lawyer:

> You have got that altogether wrong, I think. You just said you only asked for a cent and a half a line and 15 per cent ad valorem, the same as the old tariff.

Swacker answered, "Yes, sir."

Let me quote here the colloquy between the Judge and the lawyer:

> Mr. GREEN. Now, the price of cheap Japanese buttons per line would be how much?
> Mr. SWACKER. Their price, at which we would export [import] in that case, would be 6 cents.
> Mr. GREEN. Therefore 1½ cents per line would not be any 300 per cent?
> Mr. SWACKER. Yes; that would be 21 cents; on a 14-line button it would be 21 cents as a specific rate. Now, you see that would be 300 per cent or about 350 per cent of the 6 cents.

The Judge could not think that anybody would have the audacity to come down here and ask him to introduce a bill carrying rates which would equal 300 per cent or over ad valorem. Swacker explained to him that the bill he was to introduce at the demand of the manufacturers, and which he did introduce and which is now before us, did that very thing.

The Judge still was surprised and could not believe it. He was not satisfied with the explanation, so in a few moments he again brought the matter up and, page 24, said to the lawyer:

> There must be some error there in your computation as to the equivalent of the ad valorem rate or the computation made in that work to which I have referred before, because in 1913 they said that the equivalent ad valorem rate was 77.18 per cent, while now you say it is 300 per cent.

The Judge thought that the bill he was to introduce would not exceed the 77.18 per cent ad valorem equivalent. But Swacker again assured him that he was wrong; that instead of 77.18 per cent it would work out in many cases 300 per cent and over. Judge GREEN still insisted that Swacker was in error. But Swacker was correct. He knew what they wanted. He could have said further that on some buttons the specific rate in the bill would amount to over 450 per cent. He testified that these buttons came in at 7 cents a gross, some at 5 and 6 cents on a 16 and 18 line button. On a 7 cent per gross button, 18 line, the ad valorem equivalent of the rates in the bill is a fraction over 300 per cent; on a 6 cent per gross button it is 365 per cent; on a 5 cent per gross button it is 455 per cent.

Not a Republican on the committee, not a Republican in the House, knew this. But Swacker and his clients knew how this bill would operate. The rate in the bill is 1¼ cents per line per gross plus 15 per cent ad valorem. The actual duty works out this way: On an 18-line button, which is the button on your negligee shirt and underwear, the 1¼ cents rate in the bill is equivalent to a duty of 27 cents per gross, this being one and one-half—"1¼ cents per line"—times 18—18 lines. Add to this the 15 per cent ad valorem provided for in the bill and you will have the full amount of duty to be levied on that kind of button.

It is said that this bill has the same rates as those in the Payne-Aldrich Act. This is true, and no 5 or 6 or 7 or 10 or 20 cents per gross pearl or shell buttons could be or were imported under that act. The rate was absolutely prohibitive, and so is the rate in this bill.

For the 11 months ending May 31, 1919, $890,000 worth of pearl and shell buttons came into this country from all foreign countries, mostly from Japan. But we exported to foreign countries $751,340 worth of pearl or shell buttons in competition with Japan. Mr. Swacker shows, without knowing it, in his testimony why they wanted this high prohibitive tariff. They desired by excluding the cheaper buttons, which enter every household, to get a monopoly on them here and charge the American consumers such a high price and profit that they will be enabled to sell their export buttons cheaper to the foreigners in competition with Japan. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Willis, a large manufacturer, in his testimony says this rate will shut out all Japanese goods, and that is what they want.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. How does our export of pearl buttons compare with our imports?

Mr. KITCHIN. For the 11 months ending May 31, 1919, we imported $890,000 worth of pearl buttons and exported $751,000 worth; but of all other kinds of buttons we exported $1,887,000 worth.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. I believe you corrected the statement about Japanese labor prices of 15 and 20 cents a day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I stated what the hearings showed.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. You said the wage was about 50 cents.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. No man knows. Even the Tariff Commission does not know, or does not say. One witness said one rate of wages, one witness said another rate, and Judge GREEN stated still another rate.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. And you said the American rate of wages was $2.50.

Mr. KITCHIN. I never stated, because I did not know, and the evidence is conflicting. One witness put it from $2.50 to $3, another from $2.50 to $4.22, and Judge GREEN put it at $4.40.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. That is what I understood was the rate. The testimony, then, would be that the Japanese rate of labor is 400 per cent less than the American rate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. The gentleman intended to say the American rate was 400 per cent more than the Japanese rate. Lawyer Swacker says our labor here gets $2.50 to $3 and the Japanese 14 or 14½ cents. That is about 2,000 per cent more. If the gentlemen who testified are right about it, the rate of tariff ought to be 2,000 per cent in order to equalize labor wages here and there.

I am now going to call attention to one thing relative to this bill which is really gratifying. This bill changes the button provisions of the Underwood tariff act only as to pearl or shell buttons. We make in this country celluloid buttons, bone buttons, ivory buttons, silk buttons, nickel buttons, metal buttons, and many other kind of buttons; in fact, buttons embraced in the whole button industry. Pearl or shell buttons are only about one-third of our production. We produce annually about $30,000,000 worth of all kinds of buttons. In the preparation of the Underwood Act we changed and reduced the rates on every kind of buttons. The Underwood Act has worked so well and so fairly that the gentleman who introduced this bill and the gentlemen who reported it favorably to the House made no change in that act except with respect to pearl or shell buttons. They were perfectly satisfied with the Underwood Act with respect to all other kinds of buttons.

I certainly beg the pardon of Judge GREEN and of the House for taking up so much time to enlighten him and his colleagues on the committee concerning this bill. [Laughter.]

In conclusion, let me repeat briefly what this bill does. The buttons "protected" in this bill are a universal household necessity. They are used on negligee shirts, the ordinary shirtwaists, children's dresses, and on practically all kinds of underwear for men, women, and children. It is the most commonly used of all classes of buttons. The peculiar kind of specific rate provided in the bill amounts to an equivalent ad valorem of from 150 to 500 per cent, according to the value of the button. It is from three to ten times higher than the existing rate, which is 45 per cent ad valorem. This bill taxes all the people at least $5,000,000 annually, not for the benefit of the Government but for the benefit of a few manufacturers. It most aptly illustrates the Republican tariff policy—taking money from all the people and giving it for the enrichment of a favored few. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. TOWNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl, had come to no resolution thereon.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate concurrent resolution No. 8 now on the Speaker's table. Pending the submission of that request I ask the Speaker to present the resolution to the House for its information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks for the reading of the resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. For the reading of the resolution for the information of the House, and then I shall submit my request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 8.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the joint special committee, consisting of two Senators and four Representatives appointed to confer with officials of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or any political subdivision thereof, or with officers of any organization or society or with individuals, relative to the contemplated observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims, ordered to report its recommendations on or before September 1, 1919, be granted an extension of time for its report and recommendations until December 10, 1919.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. OGDEN, until September 18, 1919, on account of business.

To Mr. ASHBROOK, until September 15, on account of important business.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a communication from Director General Hines, which he asks me to place in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that in addition to my own comments I be permitted to extend my remarks by placing this communication in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House, under the order heretofore made, adjourned until Tuesday, September 2, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of Labor submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required for "miscellaneous expenses, Bureau of Naturalization, 1920" (H. Doc. No. 208); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting report directed to be made to the House of Representatives pursuant to House resolution 225 (H. Doc. No. 209); to the Committee on Labor and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4311) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Caribou National Forest, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 275), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2022) vesting in the Bureau of Pensions jurisdiction of all pension claims based upon service in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States subsequent to October 5, 1917, to repeal certain sections of article 3 of the war-risk insurance act, and for other purposes, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 277), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2883) authorizing the Meridian Highway Bridge Co., a corporation, to construct and maintain a bridge or bridges and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between Yankton County, S. Dak., and Cedar County, Nebr., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 278), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 183) providing additional time for the payment of purchase money under homestead entries of lands within the former Fort Peck Indian Reservation, Mont., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 276), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 30, 1919.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 23, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on Tuesday, August 12 last, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate, and the chosen leader of the majority party in this Chamber, delivered a very carefully prepared argument against the league of nations. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized as a learned scholar and a very studious historian, and an argument which he delivers after the debate has proceeded for months may fairly be regarded as the ablest possible presentation of the case against the league of nations. If this argument can not stand an analysis, the case of the opposition to the covenant falls to the ground.

The honorable Senator lays down the first proposition:

That mankind from generation to generation is constantly repeating itself.

And says:

We have an excellent illustration of this fact in the proposed experiment now before us of making arrangements to secure the permanent peace of the world.

Thereupon he calls attention to the alluring promises made in the treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815, and the high purposes alleged in the treaty of the Holy Alliance, and shows historically that wars followed and not peace. He argued by necessary inference that these promises of peace and assurances of high purposes did not produce peace but war, and therefore that the declaration of purposes found in the present covenant of the league of nations would naturally be followed by war, because "mankind repeats itself."

The Senator quotes in derision the preamble to the covenant, and says:

> Turn to the preamble of the covenant of the league of nations, now before us, which states the object of the league. It is formed—
> "In order to promote international cooperation, to achieve international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war, by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations, by the firm establishment of the understandings of international laws as the actual rule of conduct among governments and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another."

The Senator then said:

> No one would contest the loftiness or the benevolence of these purposes. Brave words, indeed. They do not differ essentially from the preamble of the treaty of Paris (1815), from which sprang the Holy Alliance.

In other words, Mr. President, the promises made by the treaty of the Holy Alliance having led to war, these promises will also lead to war, because "mankind repeats itself."

The obvious fallacy of this argument is that the alleged "purposes" of the Holy Alliance had nothing to do with the consequences which ensued from that alliance. War did not result from the virtuous promises made to the people by the Holy Alliance. The Holy Alliance made willfully deceitful and false promises of brotherly love and peace in order to deceive the people of Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and thus prevent them from going into a revolution, as the people had done in France under like conditions of tyranny and brute military power. The fact that wars followed the treaty of the Holy Alliance was because this treaty was between military dynasties, made by monarchial autocracies, each controlled by intrigue, by rival armaments, and by ambitious secret purposes. They were lined up against other similar governments at that time not greatly in advance of them in structure of government or in conception of liberty and popular rights. England, however, was becoming steadily more democratic, and soon withdrew from the treaty of Paris. France ultimately withdrew from the Holy Alliance. The cause of war was wrapped up in the treaty of the Holy Alliance of Russia, Austria, and Prussia because of their then several secret dynastic military ambitions. There was during that period no available or possible provision in the world providing for conciliation and arbitration in the settlement of international disputes. There was no means of promoting progressive disarmament, and the ambitions and the lust for power, unrestrained by law, unavoidably led to war as a necessary consequence. There was no adequate restraining power in all the world and no forum where the organized opinion and power of mankind could make itself effective for peace as there is available now.

The Senator from Massachusetts has shown himself unable to discriminate between the unavoidable consequences of war of governments based on tyranny and brute force, such as Russia, Prussia, and Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey, and the consequences favorable to peace of governments based on the consent of the governed, on justice and liberty, such as the United States and Canada, the South American Republics, Australia, Great Britain, France, Belgium, and Italy. Such blind leadership might easily prove to be a national calamity.

The Senator from Massachusetts has failed to discover what every student of history ought to know who has a discerning mind and an intelligent comprehension, that the instability and wars of military dynasties had adequate causes, and that these causes rest in the "rule of the few," moved by intrigue, by gross human selfishness, by ambition and lust for the property of other people, leading them to develop great armies nominally for defense, but always secretly for offense, so well described by Von Bernhardi in his description of the Hohenzollerns and of Frederick II. Everybody seems to know this except the Senator from Massachusetts. The stability of Republics and their power for peace are not based on preambles nor lofty promises of high purposes, as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to think. They are based upon sound principles affecting the structure of government, which go to guarantee justice and liberty and humanity and the organized righteous self-government of the people. These are the principles which guarantee stability. These are the principles which not only promise but will make sure the peace of the world.

The Senator loosely argues that since "mankind repeats itself," and since the Holy Alliance made virtuous "promises" and war followed, therefore the virtuous promises of the present covenant of a league of free nations can mean nothing but war. The Senator argues from the false premise that the promises of the autocrats of the Holy Alliance were sincere. They were not sincere. They were wickedly false. I wondered, when the learned Senator was quoting the treaty of the Holy Alliance with its virtuous "promises," that he did not also quote the secret amendments to the treaty of the Holy Alliance of 1822, which disclose the infinitely wicked deceit of these promises—the secret treaty of Verona, in which the "holy alliance of liars" pledged their undying hostility to the democracies of the world and the freedom of the press. Since the Senator thinks it was the virtuous "promises" of the Holy Alliance that led to war, let me call his attention to their pledge to destroy the democracies of the world, and he will see, I trust, an abundant cause for war necessarily involved in the treaty of the Holy Alliance with its secret amendments at Verona, not because of their virtuous promises but in spite of them. Their secret purpose was war.

Listen to the philosophy and historical admonition of the secret treaty of Verona:

> "The undersigned, specially authorized to make some additions to the treaty of the Holy Alliance, after having exchanged their respective credentials, have agreed as follows:
> "Article 1. The high contracting powers being convinced that the system of representative government is equally as incompatible with the monarchial principles as the maxim of the sovereignty of the people with the divine right, engage mutually, in the most solemn manner, to use all their efforts to put an end to the system of representative governments, in whatever country it may exist in Europe, and to prevent its being introduced in those countries where it is not yet known.
> You can only put an end to a government by war.
> "Art. 2. As it can not be doubted that the liberty of the press is the most powerful means used by the pretended supporters of the rights of nations to the detriment of those of princes, the high contracting parties promise reciprocally to adopt all proper measures to suppress it, not only in their own States but also in the rest of Europe." (Vol. 53, pt. 7, p. 6781, 64th Cong., 1st sess., Apr. 25, 1916.)

The King of Prussia and the Emperor of Austria were the real autocratic monarchs behind this deadly compact to destroy the democracies of the world and establish "world power" for themselves and their allies as the military autocrats of mankind.

Here these military autocrats, who had offered themselves to the people of Europe as the servants of Christ and the guardians of the peace of Europe, were, in fact, secretly pledging themselves to murder unoffending people of other lands who had the temerity to believe in representative government and in the liberty of a free press. They instantly made war on the unoffending Spanish and Portuguese people and the innocent Italian people, and put them all under absolute monarchies, and would have done the same thing to the South American Republics but for Great Britain and the Monroe message.

Does the Senator from Massachusetts really believe that it was the virtuous "promises" of the Holy Alliance that led to war, or the "secret" purposes and ambitions of these military monarchial despots who were secretly plotting to rule the world by brute force? There is a vast difference, Mr. President, between the promises of an honest man or an honest government, of sincere well-meaning democracies, and the promises of trained liars, murderers, and self-seeking despots. And I feel fully justified in describing the Hohenzollerns and the Hapsburgs and the Romanoffs in these plain terms.

The Senator from Massachusetts believes that the promises of these royal scoundrels may be justly compared with the promises and aspirations of the honest organized democracies of the whole world basing an alliance not upon their pretenses of justice and liberty but upon the demonstrated fact that they are truly willing to die for liberty and justice.

The Senator from Massachusetts really believes in the rule of the representatives of the people over the people, in the rule of the few over the many. He would draw a wide distinction between "representative" government and government "by the people." He does not believe that the people of a State have a right to instruct or control their elected representatives or to initiate and pass the laws that they want or to veto laws they do not want. He thinks that for the people to express their opinion upon a public question is dangerous to the principle of constitutional government.

Am I hasty in making this charge against the leader of the Republican Party in the Senate? I most certainly am not. The Senator from Massachusetts may have forgotten, but I have not forgotten, his famous speech in Boston on September 15, 1907, for I had been but two days in the Senate when, on December 18, 1907, Senator Hale, of Maine, had printed 20,000 copies of this famous speech of the Senator from Massachusetts as Senate Document 114, Sixtieth Congress, first session. This speech was delivered in opposition to a bill then pending in the Massachusetts Legislature, known as the "public-opinion bill." The "public-opinion bill" proposed to permit the people of Massachusetts the astounding liberty of expressing their opinion upon a public measure, but not exceeding four measures in any one year. This bill Senator LODGE violently opposed on the ground that it would overthrow the constitution of Massachusetts and destroy representative government. I shall not challenge the Senator's integrity of mind or his integrity of purpose in making this speech. I shall assume that he honestly believed that the opinion of the people was dangerous to constitutional government. At all events, this was his argumet.

Twenty thousand copies of his speech were sent into Maine in order to defeat a campaign then pending for the initiative and referendum in that State.

The Senator said in criticizing the public-opinion bill that it—would mean nothing less than a complete revolution in the fabric of our Government and in the fundamental principles upon which the Government rests.

That it—would undermine and ultimately break down the representative principles in our political and governmental system.

With the assistance of Kingsbury B. Piper, secretary of the State Referendum League of Maine, I prepared and had printed as a memorial to Congress the answer of the State Referendum League of Maine to the Senator from Massachusetts (Senate Document 521, 60th Cong., 1st sess.). I caused 20,000 copies to be printed and I franked them to Maine, and when the people of Maine came to pass upon the validity of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts that the people should have no right to express their opinions on public questions, either by public-opinion statute or by the initiative and referendum, they decided against the argument of the learned Senator from Massachusetts, and the honorable Senator from Maine who circulated the famous Boston speech against the public-opinion bill did not find it desirable to stand for reelection.

In the State of Massachusetts, in the last election, when the people were selecting their delegates to a constitutional congress, there was a campaign in behalf of the initiative and referendum. I had prepared by the National Popular Government League, by Judson King, secretary, an argument for this great measure of popular government, and caused it to be printed as Senate Document 763, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, which was used in the Massachusetts campaign in favor of the initiative and referendum. An overwhelming majority of the delegates who had favored it were elected, and even the president of Harvard, who opposed it, was defeated. Senator Weeks opposed it, and he was defeated, and Senator WALSH, who favored it, was elected and is now present in the Senate.

I commend the judgment of the people of Maine and Massachusetts to the considerate judgment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. His leadership against popular government has failed both in Maine and in the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

The Senator from Massachusetts does not believe in the wisdom of the people. He does not believe that the people have the intelligence to initiate laws they do want or to veto laws they do not want, and therefore he does not have any great degree of confidence in the stability of a league of the great democracies of the world or their ability to make sure their own peace. He looks upon them with less confidence than he did upon the military autocracies that framed the treaty of the Holy Alliance, for the Senator favored a league in 1915, when the autocracies were in full flower.

I am devoutly thankful that there are hundreds of thousands and millions of Republicans in the United States who do not agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in this view, and that there are on this floor splendid Republican Senators who do believe in popular government and in the right of the people to govern and who have confidence in democracies.

And I pause to say, Mr. President, that those who believe in popular government are deeply desirous of having passed through the Senate a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act, and I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to give his support to such a bill in order that the "representative system" of selecting Senators and Congressmen may not be perverted by the corrupt and sinister influences that by money and fraud are able unduly to influence the nomination and election of Congressmen and Senators. For six years the progressive Senators on this floor have been trying to get a thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act, but have not been able as yet to do so. Why? I will leave to those who opposed it and to those who do not favor it and to those who secretly throw the weight of their influence against it to answer that question before the end of the next session of Congress.

The Senator's whole argument is based upon his inability to perceive the difference between the relative trustworthiness of democracies and autocracies, and in his violent assaults upon the league he tries to show that we ought to have no league of nations at all. He goes so far as to denounce the banner of the proposed league of nations, of the free nations of the earth, of our wonderful Allies, of our heroic Allies, who died for liberty and justice and civilization, as a "mongrel" banner, and he attaches to the league of nations the unmerited stigma of "Bolshevism" as illustrating wicked "internationalism" as contrasted with his own admirable "Americanism."

Mr. President, all good Americans believe in Americanism in its highest and purest and truest meaning.

Mr. President, a man can be a good citizen of a town, of a county, of a state, of a nation, and of a world without inconsistency. He can love his home, and be utterly devoted to his own nation, and be a glorious American, and yet be generously disposed and favor international justice and liberty and good neighborhood, and the means of attaining them.

The galleries always applaud when a Senator strikes an oratorical pose and thunders forth his sturdy Americanism, and the Senator from Massachusetts did not fail to strike this popular chord. The Senator gloriously said:

Call me selfish if you will, conservative, or reactionary; but an American I have remained all my life. I can never be anything else but an American, and I must think of the United States first.

Fine! This is magnificent. The galleries burst with applause; but, Mr. President, in June, 1915, at Union College, the Senator was still an American, whether "selfish, conservative, or reactionary," and he told the world then in language clear and forceful—and I use his own words—that—

Nations must unite as men unite to preserve peace and order.

He stated that nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country—

You must not go to war.

Fine! This is splendid, but a flat contradiction of his present attitude that nations must not unite to preserve peace and order, that they must not be so united as to say to any single country "You must not go to war."

The Senator's Americanism at Union College did not prevent his making an earnest argument in favor of a league of nations, and when he made the argument in favor of a league at Union College it was fine Americanism. It was fine Americanism when Theodore Roosevelt made the same argument in receiving the Nobel prize at Christiania in 1910. President Taft shows his fine Americanism when he loves America and loves his fellow men throughout the world and stands for a program of assured peace through the honest cooperation of all the great democracies of earth.

It is fine Americanism when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and other patriotic Republicans and Democrats stand on this floor and urge a league of free nations.

The Senator from Massachusetts must not attempt to monopolize Americanism, for selfishness and partisanship in foreign affairs do not describe Americanism.

When Germany and Austria and Bulgaria and Turkey, the great military dynasties, were at the height of their power the Senator from Massachusetts argued in favor of nations uniting to prevent war. He was willing to admit military dynasties to a league of nations to prevent war, but now that the military dynasties have been humbled to the dust, now that brute force based on the doctrine that might makes right has been utterly overthrown by the honest peace-loving democracies of the world, the Senator rises up as the chief opponent of what he himself generously argued as a good American in 1915.

Mr. President, am I going too far if I appeal from "Philip drunk to Philip sober"?

The one great gigantic fact of all history has occurred to assure and make possible the future peace of the world and to make it comparatively easy to establish peace, and that is the overthrow of arbitrary power, the overthrow of the Hohenzollerns, the Hapsburgs, the Romanoffs, and their brood of princes, grand dukes, et id genus omne, and the establishment of the great doctrines of liberty, justice, and self-government and the establishment of the overwhelming power of the democracies of the world.

The Senator from Massachusetts fails to recognize the one great event which makes this war the most notable war of all history and which alone opens wide the door to permanent world peace.

The Senator from Massachusetts having argued that it was un-American to recognize this "mongrel" flag of the free nations of earth, proceeds, absurdly enough, to argue that he and his colleagues will accept the "mongrel" flag and all its evils provided reservations be inserted in the ratification, which do not really change the meaning of it, but would prevent any friendly ally in the future from changing the meaning of it.

The Senator does not recognize any difference between the legal and moral obligations of the league. He says treaty obligations are merely moral obligations, and with this view I am in entire accord. But, Mr. President, an interpretative resolution separate from the resolution of ratification of the treaty, interpreting the meaning of the covenant, would protect the United States from the possibility of any future charge of moral delinquency by any nation on earth, and prevent any nations, friendly or otherwise, from charging that the United States refused to do what it agreed to do. The only difference between the effect of a resolution separate and apart as an interpretation and an amendment or reservation in the face of the ratifying resolution is that the latter would require the action of all other nations, might produce serious confusion, would certainly postpone final action for some months at a time when prompt action in declaring peace is of the highest importance, while a resolution of interpretation would avoid these obvious objections. There is one possible partisan advantage in putting amendments and reservations on the proposed league. It might to that extent discredit with some of our own people and with those of foreign countries the President of the United States and the members of the peace conference who represented the United States at Paris.

Is it un-American if I should feel unwilling to discredit our representatives, either at home or abroad, unnecessarily? The delay in ratifying the peace treaty is paralyzing our export trade. Our favorable balance of trade fell off $400,000,000 in the month of July in 31 days. Our foreign-exchange market has gone into complete demoralization awaiting the determination of the conditions of peace.

We hear no proposal from Great Britain or France or Italy or Belgium or Japan for putting amendments into this proposed league. They do not have any fear that the friendly nations of the earth, based on self-government, liberty, and justice, will misinterpret the covenant to their disadvantage. None of them have imagined that they were relinquishing their rights of self-government or subjecting themselves to the coercion of a league of foreign nations. On the contrary, they wrote into the league section 10 for the protection of the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every nation. This covenant was drawn up by the ablest men in the world—if the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon the apparent neglect—chosen men representing all of the great nations. It was subjected to the closest scrutiny. It carries out and makes possible the aspirations of The Hague conventions, with the addition of methods for conciliation and arbitration and disarmament and means for protecting the territorial integrity and existing political independence of nations by boycott, blockade, and even armed force, which will assuredly rarely, if by any possibility ever, be necessary.

This should not be made a partisan question. The Senator from Massachusetts taught me the sound doctrine in one of the great maxims of the United States Senate, which has been honored for a hundred years, and that is—

Party lines cease at tide water.

Is it un-American if I appeal to the honorable Senator to sustain this venerable and worthy maxim of the Senate? Why does he, before the treaty arrives, sign his round robin? Why does he marshal his political followers as far as he can in hostility to the aspirations of mankind? The world is weary, utterly weary, of war. The industries, the commerce of the whole world, have been profoundly shaken by the gigantic destruction and waste of this war.

The cost of living because of this Great War has become painful and irksome to the people of the whole world. It is of the most urgent importance that we get back to the basis of peace, in order that we may address ourselves to solving the problem of the high cost of living in this country, which is greatly perplexing to the Congress as well as the people at home.

The unhappy people of Europe are struggling to reestablish themselves. Millions of men, women, and children have died in this great struggle to establish on earth human liberty and the right of the people of the earth to self-government. Side by side in the hills and in the valleys of France lie thousands of our beloved sons with the cherished youth of Great Britain, Belgium, France, Italy, and of our other Allies. They died in a war whose great purpose was to overthrow arbitrary power, to establish government upon a sound basis of the consent of the governed, to establish forever "peace on earth, good will toward men." Surely it is not un-American that we should desire that their infinite sacrifice should not be in vain. Honest democracies do not want war, nor the cost of war, nor to have their children die in battle. The people who pay the cost of the war, who send their sons to die upon the battle field, who pay the taxes of war, and control democracies will not permit war that can possibly be avoided.

Perhaps without a league the future peace of the world might be accomplished, but a league of free nations of the earth, established with the power to say to outlaw nations "You must not go to war," as the Senator from Massachusetts so finely argued in June, 1915, at Union College, will secure and make certain the ends for which the youth of the world was sent to the battle fields to die.

May I not be permitted to appeal to the better Americanism of the Senator from Massachusetts not to throw himself across the path of human progress and world peace? He is not (as he thinks) waging a war against Woodrow Wilson; he is waging a war against the desires and the hopes of all mankind.

We have joined the sons of France, Great Britain, and Italy and our other great allies in breaking down the military autocracies of Europe. Are we not in honor bound to stand by our allies until the new governments, the new democracies of Europe, are established and made stable by the stabilizing force of the organized powers of mankind that league to preserve peace?

Shall we scuttle like cowards and cravens from the wounded peoples of Europe before the nations born of this war can balance themselves and be at peace and a blessing to themselves and to the world when with the league of the great democracies we can easily assure them stability and peace?

Is it un-American to carry out our implied obligations to Europe?

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts interprets article 10 to mean that the council in advising the means to be employed to preserve the territorial integrity and the existing political independence of member nations will be authorized to send American troops to the ends of the earth in every petty quarrel that might arise anywhere in the world.

The Senator urges that we would have a "moral" obligation to take the advice, and the "moral" obligation being as strong as a legal obligation we would be obliged to obey or be guilty of a breach of our moral obligations, a thing absolutely inconceivable to the austere Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator greatly enlarges upon this great, unhappy thought and in his imagination he sees our soldiers sent into central Arabia to protect the Sultan of Hejaz under the irresistible advice of the council.

Mr. President, with the establishment of a league of nations, with the great democracies of the world in honest cooperation, there are many provisions which will prevent war or the need of soldiers.

For example:

Every means possible for conciliation.

Every means for arbitration, and at last if a nation be determined to be an outlaw nation in violation of the organized opinion of mankind, and then invades the territorial integrity of a member nation and its existing political independence, there is a penalty so gigantic that no nation would dare to face it; that is, a world boycott, a complete separation of that outlaw nation and of its nationals from any commercial, financial, postal, telegraphic, or any other means of communication with the citizens of other nations.

No nation could stand this. But this is not all. It is only on the extremely remote if not impossible contingency that this would not suffice to restore an outlaw nation to sanity, then and then only would it be necessary for the council to "advise" means of military and naval coercion.

It is to be assumed by men of common sense and common honesty that the council in such a remote contingency would give sensible and honest advice and that the great, honest, peace-loving democracies of the earth would act in good faith in regard to the advice.

If in the extremely remote contingency which might thus arise the still more unlikely occurrence should take place that the advice should prove foolish or tyrannical, no nation would be compelled as a "moral" obligation to observe idiotic advice.

The Senator from Massachusetts is unduly alarmed. He is seeing ghosts which do not exist.

Article 10, pledging every member nation its territorial integrity and existing political independence, is vital to the peace of the world, and under no circumstances should this assurance be removed from the treaty or modified.

The Senator finds an insuperable difficulty in article 15 because it provides that any dispute may be submitted to the council, and the council might submit it to the assembly, and the assembly might make a "report" unfavorable to the United States, and the dispute might be on the question of immigration with Japan. Terrible! The answer is, first, that no such dispute could arise, because it would be an invasion of our existing political independence and territorial integrity, and, second, if it did arise, in spite of the article 10, in spite of the preamble to the treaty, and the council did not throw it out of court because it was "solely within the domestic jurisdiction" of the United States, and, finally, if the entire assembly made a report against the United States, nothing would follow, because nothing could follow under article 15, except that Japan might wage a war, and she can do that now. Nothing would follow, because there is nothing in the treaty to compel the enforcement of the opinion or report of the assembly in that particular.

It is left to the parties unable to settle their controversy under the report then to resort to war, in which the world will take no part except conciliation, world opinion, and world influence. The report is not made enforceable by article 15. Such a report is only of the same force as a report by the council, wherein the members agree not to go to war against a member who complies with the recommendations of the report. If the council fails to reach a unanimous report the members reserve liberty of action.

We would not be any worse off if the three times impossible should happen, as imagined by the Senator, for Japan could make war on us now if Japan wished to do so. Besides that, we could withdraw from the league of nations if we did not like the administration of it. There is not the slightest possibility, however, that any nation will ever withdraw from this league once it has entered into it, because this league will work to perfection, giving a forum, a meeting place, where the nations of the world can come together and use there the common sense and common honesty of the human race, and that will be found sufficient.

The Senator is seeing ghosts, which were not visible at Union College. The Senator declares that if other nations are willing to subject themselves to the domination of a league, he will never, never consent for the United States to be dominated by the league.

The Senator need not trouble himself. Other nations are not willing to subject themselves to the domination of a league, but enter into the league for the purpose of protecting themselves against the domination of outlaw military tribes or nations who are not yet sufficiently advanced in civilization to appreciate the blessings of liberty and justice and self-government.

The Senator is very much frightened about the Monroe doctrine, and it is extremely difficult for me to believe in the sincerity of those who argue the Monroe doctrine will be weakened by the proposed covenant which explicitly recognizes it and implicitly confirms it by every principle of the proposed covenant.

The Senator is terribly afraid that we can not withdraw, because he thinks that we could not withdraw except by unanimous vote, that all our international obligations and all obligations under the covenant had been fulfilled. It never crossed the mind of any honest man who had part in framing this league covenant that any member could be refused the right to withdraw on any such ground. Such an interpretation is not only contradicted by the President of the United States but is absurd. Of course, a nation in withdrawing should withdraw and discharge its obligations at the same time. But the Senator proves too much. He discovers that it requires unanimous action to withdraw.

If it were an affirmative action of the league (which it is not) it might be true, for an affirmative action of the league does require unanimous consent; but this discovery entirely destroys the long argument which the Senator makes about the league dominating the United States, interfering with immigration, tariffs, and so forth, as no one is stupid enough to contend a unanimous vote of the assembly to deal unjustly with any nation is possible.

The Senator greatly enlarges upon the United States meddling in the internal affairs of the nations of Europe. There is nothing in the league of nations which justifies this notion of the Senator from Massachusetts. On the contrary, the 10th article prevents any interference with the existing political independence of the nations. It was necessary, in setting up the new Governments of Europe, made up out of the heretofore subject peoples of Austria and Germany, to provide the means of which they should be established, including Turkey and Bulgaria; but beyond this the treaty does not go, and in this the covenant of the league takes no part.

Mr. President, I favor the liberty and freedom of all peoples sufficiently advanced to govern themselves or under mandatories where backward and not yet qualified. I wish to see Ireland free and the Philippines. I wish to see Egypt and Porto Rico free; I wish to see India and Korea free to govern themselves, and given honest, faithful help to accomplish this end in safety and peace.

The members of the league, article 23 (b), "undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control."

What is the just treatment referred to? It can be nothing less than liberty, freedom, and self-government, such as was involved in the proposals of President Wilson as a basis of the armistice, and which was accepted by all our great allies.

We set the example in Cuba, we are following it in the Philippines, we must perfect it in Porto Rico, and we must use our influence in having this element of justice carried out throughout the world undeterred by commercial or industrial selfishness.

Mr. President, the league of nations in this covenant is a league between the great, honest, peace-loving democracies and free nations of the whole earth.

Its moral influence for peace and good will toward men is the greatest power ever invoked for the peace, the happiness, the prosperity of mankind. It not only proposes peace; it provides the most abundant means and mechanism by which to accomplish it. It provides the completest means for the conciliation of disputes and the settlement of controversies by arbitration.

It provides for disarmament and the reduction of the military and naval forces of mankind down to police purposes.

It puts an end to military dynasties. It establishes the great principles of liberty, justice, and the self-government of the people of the whole world.

On such principles it safeguards the backward peoples of the world and provides a means for leading them forward to civilization without exploitation.

It provides for the protection and preservation of the territorial integrity and existing political independence of every nation.

It provides the means to enforce the rights of member nations against aggression.

It establishes in the council and in the assembly a meeting place where all the nations of the world may in one chamber communicate with each other freely and openly.

It puts an end to secret treaties and political intrigue and military dynasties and the doctrine of divine right and the doctrine that might makes right and establishes on earth the rule of conscience, the rule of morality, the rule of international decency and justice and good neighborhood. It is not a mere peace of idealism based on a rosy dream. It is a real living, vital force, born on the battle field out of the blood of all of the nations of earth. The world will not go back. It is moving forward under the leadership of God and the everlasting doctrines of Christ. Let the Senator from Massachusetts beware of throwing himself across the path of the righteous judgment of mankind.

INDEX TO TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, yesterday I asked and obtained the privilege to have inserted in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks an index to the German peace treaty, which was prepared for my own use by Maj. J. Ruben Clark, jr., former Solicitor of the Department of State. The copy of the index did not accompany my speech as printed in the RECORD of to-day. I therefore ask that the matter may be inserted in the proceedings of to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DATA PRESENTED TO THE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, UNITED STATES SENATE, RELATING TO THE TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

[Prepared by Maj. J. Reuben Clark, jr., formerly Solicitor of the Department of State.]

Table of cessions, renouncements, grants, deliveries, releases, waivers, recognitions, obligations, and undertakings by Germany, and of compensation for and credits against the same, under the treaty of Versailles.

[NOTE 1. The "Principal Allied and Associated Powers" are the United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, and Japan. The "Allied and Associated Powers" are the foregoing powers and all other signatory of the Treaty, except Germany. The "High Contracting Parties" are all signatories of the Treaty. It is not clear who are designated as "Allies."

NOTE 2. The page references first given are to the two-language text (Senate Doc. 51, 66th Cong., 1st sess.). The italic page references are to the English text (Senate Doc. 49, 66th Cong., 1st sess.).

NOTE 3. The table below is designed to show side by side the property or rights given up by Germany, whether it be territory ceded or renounced, obligations assumed or acknowledged, rights renounced or abrogated, rights recognized, or property rights surrendered (placed in the left-hand column); and the credit, if any allowed, for such property on the general reparation account (placed in the right-hand column). As to items as to which it is expressly provided that credit shall be given, it is so stated in the right-hand column opposite the item. If it is expressly provided in the Treaty that no credit shall be given, this also is stated in that column. When the matter is doubtful, a question mark is placed in that column, after the entry. If no entry at all is made in the credit column, it means nothing has been found in the Treaty to indicate that any credit at all shall be given.

NOTE 4. Speaking broadly and generally the theory of the Treaty in the matter of the making up by Germany of damages and losses, appears to be this: Restitution shall be made of all Allied and Associated property taken by or coming into the possession of Germany since the war began, if the property is now in existence. In addition to this, reparation shall be made for property lost or destroyed and for civilian personal injuries caused by the war. The Reparation Commission is to make the adjustment for this, seemingly by making one bill against Germany covering everything and by then giving on this account credit for the assets turned over by Germany for which credit is to be allowed. No credit is allowed for the proportion of public debt assumed by cessionaries of territory.

NOTE 5. The Treaty also provides for the liquidation of all German property in Allied and Associated countries, and of the property of all nationals of such Powers in Germany, including the private securities held in Germany of companies of Allied and Associated Powers. All cash assets of such liquidation held by an Allied or Associated Power go to the payment of claims (in respect of property, rights, and interests) against Germany by the Powers' nationals, the balance, if retained by the Power, is to be paid to the Reparation Commission and credited on the reparation account.]

I. ELEMENTS AND PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN RESPONSIBILITIES AND LIABILITIES.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
DAMAGES.
Germany accepts the responsibilities of Germany and her Allies for causing all the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Germany and her Allies. (Art. 231, p. 249; p. 91.)	"The following shall be reckoned as credits to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations: "(a) Any final balance in favor of Germany under Section V (Alsace-Lorraine) of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe) and Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present treaty: "(b) Amounts due to Germany in respect of transfers under Section IV (Saar Basin) of Part III (political clauses for Europe), Part IX (financial clauses) and Part XII (ports, waterways, and railways); "(c) Amounts which in the judgment of the Reparation Commission should be credited to Germany on account of any other transfers under the present Treaty of property, rights, concessions, or other interests. "In no case, however, shall credit be given for property restored in accordance with Article 238 of the present part." (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94.)
Germany undertakes that she will make compensation for all damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an Allied or Associated Power against Germany by such aggression by land, by sea, and from the air. (Art. 232, p. 249; p. 91.) The amount of such damage for which compensation shall be made is to be determined by the Reparation Commission and notified to Germany. (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92.)
Compensation may be claimed from Germany for damages under following heads (Art. 244, Annex I, p. 259; p. 95): (1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardments or other attacks on land, on sea, or from the air, and all the direct consequences thereof, and of all operations of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising. (2) Damage by Germany or her Allies caused to civilian victims by acts of cruelty, violence, or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment, or evacuation, of exposure at sea or of being forced to labor), wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims. (3) Damage caused by Germany or her Allies, in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work or to honor, as well as to surviving dependents of such victims. (4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war. (5) As damages caused to the peoples of the Allied and Associated Powers, all pensions and compensations in the nature of pensions to naval and military victims of war (including members of the air force), whether mutilated, wounded, sick, or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each of them as being the capitalized cost of such pensions and compensation at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France at such date. (6) The cost of assistance by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to prisoners of war and to their families and dependents. (7) Allowances by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to the families and dependents of mobilized persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year. (8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Germany or her allies to labor without just remuneration.	And see Article 250, p. 307, p. 112. Germany shall be given credit on the Reparation Account for the value as assessed by the Reparation Commission of material handed over under Article VII of the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and Article III of the Armistice Agreement of January 16, 1919, and for any other mate-

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
(9) Damage in respect of all property wherever situated belonging to any of the Allied or Associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval and military works or materials, which have been carried off, seized, injured, or destroyed by the acts of Germany or her allies on land, on sea, or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war. (10) Damage in the form of levies, fines, and other similar exactions imposed by Germany or her Allies upon the civilian population. "The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in case of voluntary default by Germany, and which Germany agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances." (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 18, p. 275; p. 101.) Damage for repairing, reconstructing, and rebuilding property in the invaded and devastated districts, including reinstallation of furniture, machinery, and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the dates when the work is done. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (e), p. 269; p. 99.) Interest shall be debited to Germany as from May 1, 1921, in respect of her debt as determined by the Commission, after allowing for sums already covered by cash payments or their equivalent, or by bonds issued to the Commission, or under Article 243. The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent unless the Commission shall determine at some future time that circumstances justify a variation of this rate. The Commission, in fixing on May 1, 1921, the total amount of the debt of Germany, may take account of interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damage as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 16, p. 273; p. 100.)	rial handed over in accordance with the Armistice of November 11, 1918, and all subsequent Armistice Agreements, for which, as having nonmilitary value credit should, in the judgment of the Reparation Commission, be allowed to the German Government. (Article 250, p. 307; p. 112.)
RESTITUTION. Restitution in cash of cash taken away, seized, or sequestered; and restitution of animals, objects of every nature and securities taken away, seized, or sequestrated, in the cases in which it proves possible to identify them in territory belonging to Germany or her allies. (Art. 238, p. 255; p. 93.)	No credit on compensation account. (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94; Art. 250, p. 307; p. 112.)
Germany undertakes to devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the Allied and Associated Powers to the extent that these Powers may determine (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 1, p. 283; p. 104) and to make direct application of Germany's economic resources to reparation as specified in Annexes III, IV, V, and VI (Part VIII, sec. 1) relating, respectively, to merchant shipping, to physical restoration, to coal and derivatives of coal, and to dyestuffs and other chemical products. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold, or in ships, securities and commodities or otherwise, Germany shall be required, under such conditions as the Commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constitute an acknowledgment of the said part of the debt. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (a), p. 267; p. 98.)	"The value of the property transferred and any services rendered by her under these Annexes (Part VIII) assessed in the manner therein prescribed, shall be credited to her (Germany) towards liquidation of her obligations under the above articles." (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.)
APPLICATION OF GERMAN ASSETS. PRIORITIES. "Subject to such exceptions as the Reparation Commission may approve, the first charge upon all the assets and revenues of the German Empire and its constituent states shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present Treaty, or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto or under arrangements concluded between Germany and the Allied and Associated Powers during the Armistice or its extensions. "Up to May 1, 1921, the German Government shall not export or dispose of, and shall forbid the export or disposal of, gold without the previous approval of the Allied and Associated Powers acting through the Reparation Commission." (Art. 248, p. 305; p. 111.) "The priority of charges established by Article 248 shall, subject to the qualifications made below, be as follows: "(a) The cost of the armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 during the Armistice and its extensions. "(b) The cost of any armies of occupation as defined under Article 249 after the coming into force of the present treaty. "(c) The cost of reparation arising out of the present treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto. "(d) The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Germany under the Armistice Conventions or under this Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto. "The payment for such supplies of food and raw material for Germany and such other payments as may be judged by the Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Germany to meet her obligations in respect of reparation will have priority to the extent and upon the conditions which have been or may be determined by the Governments of the said Powers." (Art. 251, pp. 307–309; p. 112.) The foregoing provisions do not affect the rights of the Allied and Associated Powers to dispose of enemy assets and property within their respective jurisdictions. (Art. 252, p. 309; p. 113.)

I. ELEMENTS AND PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN RESPONSIBILITIES AND LIABILITIES—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
"Nothing in the foregoing provisions shall prejudice in any manner charges or mortgages lawfully effected in favor of the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals respectively, before the date at which a state of war existed between Germany and the Allied or Associated Power concerned, by the German Empire or its constituent states, or by German nationals, on assets in their ownership at that date." (Art. 253, p. 309; p. 113.)
The successive installments paid over by Germany in satisfaction of the claims will be divided by the Allied and Associated Governments in proportions which have been determined upon by them in advance on a basis of general equity and of the rights of each. (Art. 237, p. 253; p. 93.)
PROPERTY, RIGHTS, AND INTEREST.
The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right (subject to contrary stipulations in the Treaty) to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territories ceded to them by the present treaty. (Art. 297, p. 367; p. 134; and see also Art. 252, p. 309; p. 113.) This applies to industrial, literary, and artistic property dealt with under war legislation by the Allied and Associated Powers (Art. 298, Annex, par. 15, p. 385; p. 141), but rights of industrial, literary, and artistic property not so treated shall be restored, and rights which would have been established except for the war shall be recognized and established (Art. 306, pp. 415, 417; p. 152). The German owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights, or interests nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that state. (Art. 297 (b), p. 367; p. 134.) Until the completion of the liquidation so provided for, the property, rights, and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 9, p. 381; p. 139.)	Price or amount of compensation fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated. (Art. 297 (c), p. 367; p. 134.) No credit on compensation account for the product of the liquidation of the property covered by these sections, except in so far as concerns any final balance in favor of Germany under Article 243. (Art. 242, p. 257; p. 94.)
The nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage and injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Annex hereto. This compensation shall be borne by Germany, and may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory of or under the control of the claimant's state, which property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex thereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated state, and the amount will be debited to Germany. (Art. 297 (c), p. 369; p. 134.)	Compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI or by an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134; and see Art. 298, Annex, p. 4, p. 379; p. 138, opposite column below.)
All property rights and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Powers and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation, or other dealing therewith, may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, or he being unwilling, by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, within the territory of other enemy powers in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 4, p. 379; p. 138).
Each of the Allied and Associated Powers reserves the right to impose limitations on industrial, literary, or artistic property, acquired before or during the war, or hereafter, of a character deemed necessary by the Power for national defense or the public interest, or except as to rights hereafter acquired, as a coercive or preventative measure against Germany, or for securing performance of the obligations of the present Treaty. But these provisions shall not apply to properties dealt with under war measures. (Art. 306, p. 419; p. 152.) Rights lapsed on account of nonperformance of any formality because of the war shall be revived. (Art. 307, p. 421; p. 153.) Such revival to be subject to regulations of war time.
Rights of priority as to such property shall be extended. (Art. 308, p. 421; p. 153).
Any claim for compensation in respect of damage or injury to property, rights, or interests by the application of measures of transfer shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property, if it still exists in specie (Art. 297 (f), p. 369; p. 135); but such right of restitution is reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights, or interests were not applied before the signature of the Armistice. (id. (g) p. 371; p. 135.)
Up to the time when restitution is carried out under Article 297, Germany is responsible for the conservation of property, rights, and interests of the nationals of allied and associated powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested that have been subjected by her to exceptional war measures. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 6, p. 381; p. 139.)

I. ELEMENTS AND PRINCIPLES OF GERMAN RESPONSIBILITIES AND LIABILITIES—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
All investments, wheresoever effected, with the cash assets of nationals of the High Contracting Parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any investment. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 12, p. 383; p. 140; Art. 306, p. 417; p. 151.)
Germany undertakes to transfer to any Power to which German territory in Europe is ceded and to any Power administering former German territory as a mandatory, under Article 22 of Part I (League of Nations) such portion of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German states, or by public or private organizations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of social or state insurance in such territory, the funds transferred to be applied to the performance of obligations arising from such insurance. (Art. 312, p. 427; p. 155.)
Without prejudice to other announcements in the Treaty the Reparation Commission may within one year from the coming into force of the Treaty demand that the German Government shall become possessed of rights and interests of German nationals in any public utility, undertaking or in any concession, operating in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria or in the possessions or dependencies of these states or in any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies, to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any power or to be administered by a mandatory under the present Treaty, and may require that the German Government transfer, within six months of the date of demand, all such rights and interests and any similar rights and interests the German Government may itself possess to the Reparation Commission. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.) The provisions of this article apply in the case of all agreements concluded with German nationals for the construction or exploitation of German works in the German oversea possessions, as well as any sub-concessions or contracts resulting therefrom which may have been made to or with such nationals. (Art. 123, p. 171; p. 63.)	Credit given on reparation account for the value assessed by the Reparation Commission of the transferred rights. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.)
WAIVER OF CLAIMS BY GERMANY.
To China and any Allied or Associated Government:
All claims arising out of the internment of German nationals in China and their repatriation, and all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of German ships in China or the liquidation, sequestration, or control of German property rights and interests in that country since August 14, 1917. (Art. 133, p. 177; p. 65.) Rights of individuals are protected under Part X of the Treaty (id.).
To Siam:
Germany waives all claims against the Siamese Government on behalf of herself and her nationals arising out of the seizures and condemnation of German ships, the liquidation of German property, or the internment of German nationals in Siam. (Art. 137, p. 179; p. 66.) Rights of individuals are protected under Part X of the Treaty (id.).
To Allied and Associated Governments:
Germany waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss, or damage of any German ships or boats, exception being made of payments due in respect of the employment of ships in conformity with the Armistice Agreement of January 13, 1919, and subsequent agreements.
Germany waives all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved, in which any of the Allied or Associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owner, charterer, insurer, or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a prize court of Germany or her allies. (Art. 244, Annex III, pars. 8-9, pp. 281-283; pp. 103-104.)
No claims or indemnities which may result from the annulment of concessions, privileges, and favors of any kind granted since August 1, 1914, to Germany or to a German national by Russia or a state or government of which the territory formerly constituted a part of Russia, shall be charged against the Allied or Associated Powers or the powers or states, governments, or public authorities which are released from their engagements by the present article. (Art. 293, p. 345; p. 126.)
Without prejudice to the provisions of the present treaty Germany undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any allied or associated power signatory of the present Treaty, including those which, without having declared war, have broken off diplomatic relations with the German Empire, any pecuniary claims based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty. The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished whoever may be the parties in interest. (Art. 439, p. 535; p. 193.)
No claim shall be made or action brought by Germany or German nationals in respect of any industrial, literary, or artistic property used during the war by any Allied or Associated Power or the nationals thereof, nor in respect of any sale, offering for sale, or use of any products, articles, or apparatus whatsoever to which such rights applied. (Art. 306, p. 417; p. 152.)

To France: Per year, for three years (options covering) delivered at the French frontier by rail or by water: Benzol, 35,000 tons. Coal tar, 50,000 tons. Sulphate of ammonia, 30,000 tons. Coal tar, may, at option of French Government, be replaced by corresponding quantities of products of distillation, such as light oils, heavy oils, anthracene, naphtalene, and pitch. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 8, p. 293; p. 108.)	Credit on reparation account. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) The material is to be purchased at a price which shall be the same as that at which they are sold to German nationals. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 9, p. 295; p. 108.)
Per year, seven million tons for ten years, and in addition, for ten years, coal equal to the difference between the annual output of the mines of the Nord and Pas de Calais before the war and the output of these mines during the ten years period. In place of coal, metallurgical coke may be accepted in the proportions of 3 tons of coke to 4 tons of coal (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 7, p. 293; p. 107), total delivery not to exceed 20,000,000 tons per year for the first five years, and 8,000,000 tons in any one year of the succeeding five years. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 2, p. 291; p. 106.)	Credit on reparation account. (Art. 236, p. 253; p. 93.) Coal to be purchased by France under stipulations as to price. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 6, p. 293; p. 107.)
To Belgium: Eight million tons of coal (option covering) annually for ten years with same privileges as to exchanging coal for coke that control with France. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 3, p. 291; p. 107.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra.)
To Italy: Coal (option covering) in the following quantities: July 1919 to June 1920, four and one-half million tons. July 1920 to June 1921, six million tons. July 1921 to June 1922, seven and one-half million tons. July 1922 to June 1923, eight million tons. July 1923 to June 1924, and each of the following five years, eight and one-half million tons. Two-thirds of actual deliveries to be land borne. Coal may be replaced by coke as in case of France. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 4, p. 291; p. 107.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra.)

XIV. GERMANY UNDERTAKES TO DELIVER NATURAL OR MANUFACEURED PRODUCTS—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
To Luxemburg: Coal (option covering) equal to the prewar annual consumption of German coal in Luxemburg, if Reparation Commission so directs. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 5, p. 293; p. 107.) Coal may be replaced by coke as in the case of France. If Reparation Commission determines that full exercise of foregoing options would interfere unduly with industrial requirements of Germany, the commission is authorized to postpone or cancel deliveries, and in so doing to settle all questions of priority; but the coal to replace the coal from destroyed mines shall receive priority over other deliveries. (Art. 244, Annex V, par. 10, p. 295; p. 108.)	Same conditions that control supply of coal to France. (Supra).
To Reparation Commission: Dyestuffs and chemicals (option covering) as commission may designate, up to 50 per cent of the total stock of each and every kind in or under German control at date of coming into force of Treaty. "Dyestuffs and chemical drugs" includes all synthetic dyes and drugs and intermediate or other products used in connection with dyeing. This arrangement also includes cinchona bark and salts of quinine. (Art. 244, Annex VI, pars. 1 and 5, pp. 295–299; pp. 108–109.)	Credit on compensation account. (Art. 236; p. 253; p. 93.) Price fixed by Reparation Commission. (Art. 244, Annex VI, par. 3, p. 297; p. 109.)
Dyestuffs and chemical drugs each six months until January 1, 1925, up to an amount not exceeding 25 per cent of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemical drugs during the previous six months' period. (Id. par. 2, p. 297; p. 109.)
To Allied and Associated Powers: Reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture, and like articles of a commercial character which Powers desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of invaded areas. (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 2 (b), pp. 283, 285; p. 104.)	Credit on reparation account. (Arts. 236–237, p. 253; p. 93; Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 5, p. 287; p. 105.)
Animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character now in Germany which Governments desire to replace animals and articles of the same nature that have been seized, consumed, or destroyed by Germany or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations. (Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 2 (a), p. 283; p. 104.)	Credit on reparation account. (Arts. 236, 237, p. 253; p. 93; Art. 244, Annex IV, par. 5–6, p. 289; p. 105.)

XV. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS, GRANTS THE FOLLOWING RIGHTS, AND MAKES THE FOLLOWING OBLIGATIONS AS TO HER EXTERNAL COMMERCE.

Duties, Charges, Prohibitions, and Restrictions Affecting Allied or Associated States:

Importations into Germany from any such states, from whatsoever place arriving, of goods, the product or manufacture of such states, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties, including internal charges, or to the maintenance or imposition of other prohibitions and restrictions, than those to which are subjected like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such state or of any other foreign country. (Art. 264, p. 321; p. 117.)

The same principles apply as to exports from Germany and her duties, charges, prohibitions, and restrictions, levied thereon by Germany. (Art. 266, p. 323; p. 117.)

Germany shall not, in administrative régime, make any discrimination against the commerce of any of the Allied and Associated States, as compared with any other of the said states or any other foreign country, even by indirect means. (Art. 265, p. 321; p. 117.)

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

Every favor, immunity, or privilege in regard to the importation, exportation, or transit of goods granted by Germany to any Allied or Associated State or to any other foreign country whatever shall simultaneously and unconditionally without request and without compensation be extended to all the Allied and Associated States. (Art. 267, p. 323; p. 118.)

CUSTOMS PROVISIONS.

To France:

For five years, all natural or manufactured products which both originate in and come from Alsace-Lorraine shall be admitted into German customs territory free of all customs duty. The French Government shall fix the amount of such importations for each year, which shall not exceed annually the average amounts of 1911–1913.

For the same period, Germany shall allow free export from Germany and reimportation to Germany exempt from all customs duties and other charges (including internal charges), yarns, tissues, and other textile materials or textile products of any kind and in any condition sent from Germany into Alsace-Lorraine, to be subjected there to any finishing process, such as bleaching, dyeing, pointing, mercerization, gassing, twisting, or dressing. (Art. 268 (a), p. 323; p. 118; Art. 68, p. 193; p. 39.)

Germany shall establish no railway or canal tariff which directly or indirectly discriminate to the prejudice of the transport of the personnel or products of the Saar mines and their accessories or subsidiaries, or of the material necessary to their exploitation, all of which shall enjoy the rights and privileges which are guaranteed to similar products of French origin. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. I, par. 6, p. 71; p. 27.)

French customs régime shall apply to the Saar Basin. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. II, par. 31, p. 85; p. 32.)

Products which both originate in and pass from the basin into Germany shall for five years be free of import duties. (Id.)

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
To Poland: For a period of three years, the same privileges as to natural or manufactured products from Poland that are granted to France in respect of Alsace-Lorraine (supra) with analogous limitations. (Art. 268 (b), p. 325; p. 118.) To Luxemburg: The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to require Germany to accord freedom from customs duty, on importation into German customs territory, to natural products and manufactured articles which both originate in and come from the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, for five years, subject to certain prescribed limitations as to amounts. (Art. 268 (c), p. 325; p. 119.) For first six months after Treaty comes into force, German duties on imports from Allied and Associated States shall not be higher than the most favorable duties which were applied to imports into Germany on July 31, 1914. For a further period of thirty months, this provision applies to products which comprised in section A of the First Category of the German Customs Tariff of December, enjoyed rates conventionalized by Treaty (on July 31, 1914) with the addition of all kinds of wine and vegetable oils, of artificial silk, and of washed or scoured wool. (Art. 269, pp. 325–327; p. 119.) The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to apply to German territory occupied by their troops a special customs régime as regards imports and exports, in the event of such a measure being necessary in their opinion in order to safeguard the economic interests of the population of these territories. (Art. 270, p. 327; p. 119.) To Morocco: Moroccan goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to French goods. (Art. 146, p. 183; p. 68.) To Egypt: Egyptian goods entering Germany shall enjoy the treatment accorded to British goods. (Art. 154, p. 185; p. 69.) SHIPPING. Allied and Associated Powers: Vessels of, entitled to treatment of most-favored nation, in German territorial waters, as regards sea fishing, maritime coasting trade, and maritime towage (Art. 271, p. 327; p. 119), and as to fishing boats all rights of inspection exercised solely by ships belonging to such Powers. (Art. 272, p. 327; p. 119.) These provisions are terminable in five years. (Art. 280, p. 333; p. 122.) New states without seacoast may have a merchant marine. (Art. 273, pp. 327–329; p. 120.) UNFAIR COMPETITION. Allied and Associated Powers: Goods of, to be protected from unfair competition by all legislative and administrative measures necessary, Germany to seize all fraudulently marked as to maker, origin, type, nature, or special characteristics (Art. 274, p. 329; p. 120), with special provisions relating to wines and spirits and their markings. (Art. 275, pp. 329–331; p. 120.) TREATMENT OF NATIONALS OF ALLIED OR ASSOCIATED POWERS. All measures relating to occupations, professions, trade, and industry must be equally applicable to all aliens and the same as enjoyed by the nationals of the most-favored nation; and all taxes, charges, and imposts direct or indirect, as to the property, rights, or interests of nationals or companies of such powers, and restrictions, must be those applied to German nationals and none other. (Art. 276, p. 331; p. 121.) Germany will recognize new nationalities acquired by her nationals under the laws of the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 278, p. 333; p. 121.) Germany will admit and permit to exercise their functions, consuls, appointed by the Allied or Associated Powers. (Art. 279, p. 333; p. 121.) Germany will extend to nationals of Allied and Asssociated Powers all rights and advantages of any kind which she has granted to nationals of Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, or Turkey, by treaties, conventions, or arrangements concluded before August 1, 1914, so long as such treaties, etc., remain in force. (Art. 291, p. 345; p. 125.) Germany will give to Allied and Associated Powers the benefit ipso facto of the rights and advantages of any kind which she has granted by treaties, conventions, or arrangements to non-belligerent states or their nationals since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of this Treaty, so long as such treaties, conventions, or arrangements remain in force. (Art. 294, p. 347; p. 126.)

XVI. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS ON HER CONTROL OF INLAND COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION, AND THE INSTRUMENTALITIES THEREOF.

FREEDOM OF TRANSIT. Germany grants freedom of transit, including crossing of territorial waters by rail, navigable waterways, or canal, to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons, and mails coming from or going to the territories of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, without subjection to any transit duty or undue delay, and to national treatment as regards charges, facilities, and other matters, all charges imposed in traffic to be reasonable and not dependent directly or indirectly on ownership or nationality of the vessel or other vehicle. (Art. 321, p. 435; p. 157.)

XVI. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS ON HER CONTROL OF INLAND COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION, AND THE INSTRUMENTALITIES THEREOF—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.

Goods in transit shall be exempt from all customs and other similar duties. (Art. 321, p. 435; p. 157.)

Transmigration traffic across Germany is to be free and unimpeded. (Art. 322, p. 435; p. 158.)

Importations and exportations:

Germany will make no discrimination or preference, direct or indirect, in duties, charges, and prohibitions on goods or persons entering or leaving her territory on account either of origin or destination. (Art. 323, p. 437; p. 158.)

Germany will not establish, as against the ports and vessels of any of the Allied and Associated Powers, any surtax or direct or indirect bounty for export or import by German vessels or ports, or by those of another Power, for example, by means of a combined tariff; and goods or persons passing through ports or by vessels of the Allied and Associated Powers shall be subject to no formality or delay other than is incident to such traffic on German vessels or through German ports. (Art. 323, p. 437; p. 158.)

Germany shall take all necessary administrative and technical measures to expedite transmission and forwarding of Allied and Associated goods, particularly perishable goods, equally with any other goods similarly routed and carried. (Art. 324, p. 437; p. 158.)

Seaports of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy all favors and all reduced tariffs granted on German railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of German ports or the port of another Power. (Art. 325, p. 439; p. 159.) And Germany must participate in the tariffs or combinations of tariffs intended to secure for ports of any Allied or Associated Power advantages similar to those granted by Germany to her own ports or the ports of any other Power. (Art. 326, p. 439; p. 159.)

Nationals, vessels, and property of Allied or Associated Powers shall, without impediment, enjoy in all German ports and on the inland navigation routes of Germany, national treatment in all respects, with complete freedom of access to all places in Germany, and with national treatment as to port and harbor facilities, including stationing, loading and unloading, duties, charges of tonnage, harbor, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine and all analogous duties. Any preferential régime granted by Germany to any Power is immediately and unconditionally extended to all Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 327, p. 441; p. 159.)

FREE ZONES.

Existing free zones in ports shall be maintained, and, with others to be established (Hamburg and Stettin, Art. 363, p. 469; p. 170), shall be subject to the Treaty régime. Goods entering or leaving such zones shall be subject to no import or export duty (except they leave the zone for consumption in the country where the zone is situated, or enter the zone for export, when the duties shall be the regular normal import or export duties Art. 330, p. 443; p. 160), except handling charges and specified statistical duty used for defraying the expenses of the port. (Art. 328, p. 441; p. 160.) All goods consumed in the zone shall be free of duty. (Art. 329, p. 443; p. 160.)

The foregoing stipulations and provisions are subject to revision at any time after five years by the Council of the League of Nations. Failing such revision, the privileges may be enjoyed only on a basis of reciprocity, unless the Council extends the period. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.)

INTERNATIONALIZATION OF WATERWAYS.

Rivers Elbe, Vltava, Oder, Niemen (Russgrom-Memel-Niemen), and Danube are, as to certain parts thereof, declared international, and also all navigable parts of these river systems which naturally provide more than one state with access to the sea, together with lateral canals and channels, and any Rhine-Danube navigable waterway. (Art. 331, p. 443–445; p. 161.)

On international waterways, declared by the Treaty, nationals, property, and flags of all nations are on a perfect equality—no distinctions being made between shipping of riparian and nonriparian state to the detriment of the latter, except that Germany may not engage in traffic between the ports of any Allied or Associated Power without the consent of that Power. (Art. 332, p. 445; p. 161.) This article also is subject to review and adjustment by the council of the League of Nations, as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.) Only maintenance charges may be levied for the use of such waterways (Art. 333, p. 445; p. 161), or for use of port facilities. (Art. 335, p. 447; p. 162.) Riparian states obliged to remove obstacles to navigation (Art. 336, p. 447; p. 162), and to erect no impeding work. (Art. 337, p. 447; p. 162.)

To France:

On the French frontiers, subject to the provisions of the Convention of Mannheim, or a substituted Convention, or the stipulations of this Treaty, France has the right to take water from the Rhine to feed navigation and irrigation canals, with the right to execute necessary works on the German banks, and the exclusive right to the power derived from the works of regulation on the river (subject to payment to Germany of half the power actually produced), the exercise of such rights not to impede navigation or involve increase to tolls, Germany undertaking not to allow construction of lateral canals on the right bank opposite French frontiers and recognizing France's right to use lands on right bank for necessary works, compensation being made to Germany therefor. (Art. 358, p. 465; p. 168.)

XVI. GERMANY ACCEPTS THE FOLLOWING RESTRICTIONS ON HER CONTROL OF INLAND COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION, AND THE INSTRUMENTALITIES THEREOF—Continued.

Property and rights given up and duties and obligations undertaken by Germany.	Credit allowed for same.
To Switzerland: Equivalent rights as to her Rhine frontier if she demands. (Art. 858, p. 465; p. 168.) To Belgium: An equivalent right to take water to feed a Rhine-Meuse navigable waterway, if constructed. (Art. 358, p. 465; p. 168.) Germany agrees to offer no objection to extending the jurisdiction of the central Rhine Commission, to designated portions of the Moselle, to additional portions of the upper part of the Rhine, and to lateral canals established to improve naturally navigable sections of the Rhine and Moselle, etc. (Art. 362, p. 469; p. 170.) RAILWAY PROVISIONS. German railway lines to carry goods of Allied and Associated Powers, either on through transit across Germany or to a destination in Germany, under the most favorable treatment as to rates, facilities, etc., accorded to any traffic by the railroads under similar conditions of transport, for example, length of route. The same treatment shall be accorded on request of any Allied or Associated Powers to specially designated goods coming from Germany to the Power. International tariffs involving through way bills shall be established. (Art. 365, p. 471; p. 171.) This article also subject to review and adjustment by the Council of the League of Nations as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.) Germany must cooperate in the establishment of a through ticket service (for passengers and their luggage) which any Allied or Associated Power may require; must accept trains and carriages coming from the territories of such Powers, forward the same at her best speed for long-distance trains, at rates no higher than for German internal service for the same distance. Most favorable tariffs must be applied to emigrant traffic going to or coming from ports of the Allied or Associated Powers. (Art. 367, p. 473; p. 171.) Germany must not apply to such through service, or to emigrant service, any technical, fiscal, or administrative measures, such as customs examinations, general police, sanitary police, and control, which would impede or delay the service. (Art. 368, p. 475; p. 172.) Articles 367, 368 are also subject to review and adjustment by the Council of the League of Nations as above set out. (Art. 378, p. 481; p. 175.) German railway rolling stock must be so fitted with apparatus as to permit their inclusion in trains of such Allied and Associated Powers as are parties to the Berne Convention (May 15, 1886, modified May 18, 1907) without hampering the action of the continuous brake, which may within ten years be adopted by Allied and Associated Powers and the acceptance of Allied and Associated rolling stock in German trains, which rolling stock shall have on the German lines the same treatment as German rolling stock as regards movement, upkeep, and repairs. (Art. 370, p. 475; p. 172.) Germany's railway administration must make arrangements with contiguous states as to the working of interstate railways; if these fail to make an agreement, the points of difference will be settled by a Commission of experts, designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany will be represented. (Art. 372, p. 479; p. 173; Art. 371, p. 477; p. 173.) For the present Germany must carry out instructions given her on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers for the carriage of troops under the provisions of this treaty, and of material, ammunition, and supplies for any use, for the transportation of supplies for certain regions, for the restoration, as rapidly as possible, of the normal conditions of transport, and for the organization of postal and telegraphic services. (Art. 375, p. 481; p. 174.) Disputes between the interested Powers regarding the "interpretation and application of the preceding articles" (seemingly articles 321–375) are to be settled as provided by the League of Nations (Art. 376, p. 481; p. 174), which may at any time "recommend the revision of such of these Articles as relate to a permanent administrative régime." (Art. 377, p. 481; p. 174.) KIEL CANAL. Kiel Canal and its approaches must be maintained free and open to vessels of commerce and of war, of all nations at peace with Germany on terms of entire equality. (Art. 380, p. 483; p. 175.) Vessels of all nations to be treated on an absolute equality as to charges and facilities and in all other respects, with vessels of Germany or of the most favored nation, without impediment as to movements of vessels or persons beyond reasonable and necessary police, customs, sanitary, immigration and emigration regulations. (Art. 381, p. 483; p. 175.) Charges levied are to be such only as are necessary for maintenance, improvements, and expenses incurred in the interests of navigation. (Art. 382, p. 485; p. 176) and no other charges shall be levied. (Art. 384, p. 485; p. 176.) Germany is bound to remove obstacles or dangers to navigation, to insure maintenance of good conditions, and not to undertake any works of a nature to impede navigation on the canal or its approaches. (Art. 385, p. 485; p. 176.) Violations of the foregoing or disputes as to the interpretations of these articles are to be referred "to the jurisdiction instituted for the purpose by the League of Nations," but small questions shall be settled in the first instance by a local authority established at Kiel by Germany. Complaints thereto may be presented by the consuls of the interested Power. (Art. 386, p. 485; p. 176.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 1.

"SPECIAL OBLIGATIONS OF GERMANY RELATING TO ALSACE-LORRAINE.

"Shall apply no special measures to German money or monetary instruments current in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 57, p. 97; p. 36.)

"Shall refund exceptional war expenditures advanced by Alsace-Lorraine or public bodies therein, beyond a proportional amount based on the ratio of the revenues of the Empire to the revenues of Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 58, p. 97; p. 36.)

"Restore to Alsace-Lorraine all property rights and interests belonging to them November 11, 1918, and now in Germany. (Art. 60, p. 99; p. 37.)

"Shall bear expense of civil and military pensions earned on November 11, 1918. (Art. 62, p. 99; p. 37.)

"Pay damages for injuries suffered by the civilian population as if Alsace-Lorraine were an Allied or Associated Country. (Art. 63, p. 99; p. 37; Art. 244, Annex I, p. 259; p. 95.)

"For ten years, furnish electrical energy (power) under contracts in force, at a rate not higher than paid by German nationals. (Art. 69, p. 105; p. 39.)

"Property rights of Alsace-Lorrainers dealt with as if they had been during war on part of allied territory. (Art. 73, p. 107; p. 40.)

"France may retain and liquidate all German national and society interests, Germany compensating her nationals. (Art. 74, p. 109; p. 40.)

"France retains exclusive control over all questions of nationality of Alsace-Lorrainers. (Art. 79, Annex, p. 115 et seq.; p. 43 et seq.)

"Germany to cancel any contract notified by French Government between Alsace-Lorrainers and Germans or German States or Empire, save certain contracts partly performed before November 11, 1918; who makes the compensation not specified. (Art. 75, p. 109; p. 41.)

"Alsace-Lorrainers preserve full and entire enjoyment of industrial property rights in Germany. (Art. 76, p. 111; p. 41.)

"France may prohibit—

"Management or exploitation by Germans.

"Ownership of mines and quarries by Germans.

"German participation in metallurgical establishments.

"(Art. 70, pp. 105–107; p. 40.)

"Germany is to pay to the French Government such proportion of all reserves accumulated by the Empire or by public or private bodies dependent upon it, for the purposes of disability and old-age insurance, as would fall to the disability and old-age insurance fund at Strasbourg. The same shall apply in respect of the capital and reserves accumulated in Germany falling legitimately to other social insurance funds, to miners; superannuation funds, to the fund of railways of Alsace-Lorraine, to other superannuation organizations established for the benefit of the personnel of public administrations and institutions operating in Alsace-Lorraine, and also in respect of the capital and reserves due by the insurance fund of private employees at Berlin, by reason of engagements entered into for the benefit of insured persons of that category resident in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 77, p. 111; p. 41.)

"REDUCTION OF MILITARY, NAVAL, AND AIR FORCES.

"1. Military Clauses:

"Army must not exceed 100,000 effectives, who must be used only to maintain order in Germany, of whom 4,000 may be officers (Art. 160, p. 191; p. 71), the Army organization, equipment, armament, munitions, and material being specified by provisions and tables in the Treaty. (Arts. 160–162, pp. 191–193; pp. 71–72, and tables following Art. 180, p. 207; p. 77.) Compulsory military service is abolished and hereafter the German Army can be constituted and recruited by voluntary enlistment only. (Art. 173, p. 201, p. 74.) The period of enlistment of noncommissioned officers and privates is twelve consecutive years (Art. 174, p. 201; p. 75), and the period of service for officers is twenty-five consecutive years. (Art. 175, p. 201; p. 75.) Officers remaining in the service must serve till they are 45 years old, and officers previously in the service must not take part in any military exercise, theoretical or practical. (Art. 175, pp. 201–203; p. 75.) Provisions covering allowable military schools are inserted (Art. 176, p. 203; p. 75), and 'Educational establishments, the Universities, societies of discharged soldiers, shooting or touring clubs, and, generally speaking, associations of every description, whatever be the age of their members, must not occupy themselves with military matters. In particular they are forbidden to instruct or exercise their members or allow them to be instructed or exercised in the profession or use of arms.' (Art. 177, p. 203; p. 75.) All measures of or appertaining to mobilization are forbidden. (Art. 178, p. 205; p. 76.) Germany must not send or accredit to any foreign country any naval, military, or air mission, nor allow any such mission to leave her territory, and must prevent her nationals enrolling in the Army, Navy, or Air Service of a foreign power, or being attached thereto as instructors. No Allied or Associated Power must enroll in or attach to their armies or naval or air forces any German national as instructors, but this shall not affect France's right to recruit for the Foreign Legion under her laws. (Art. 179, p. 205; p. 76.) Maintenance of military forces or assembling them, or upkeep of permanent works of mobilization, are forbidden on the left bank of the Rhine or within fifty kilometers of the right bank. (Art. 43, p. 61; p. 24.) All surplus arms, munitions, and war materials, including aircraft, must be surrendered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 169, p. 199; p. 73.)

"2. Naval Clauses:

"German naval forces in commission must not exceed after 2 months from coming into force of Treaty, 6 battleships, 6 light cruisers, 12 destroyers, 12 torpedo boats, but no submarines, and an equal number of vessels constructed to replace these (Art. 181, p. 211; p. 78), but replacement ships must not exceed a specified displacement (10,000 tons for armored ships), and except when a ship is lost replacement shall not occur except after 20 years for battleships and cruisers, and 15 years for destroyers and torpedo boats, counting from the launching of the ship. (Art. 190, p. 217; p. 81.) All other warships must be placed in reserve or devoted to commercial purposes. (Art. 181, p. 211; p. 78.) The navy personnel shall not exceed 15,000 officers and men, with a total officers' strength of 1,500, and including naval and military corps or reserves (Art. 183, p. 211; p. 79), all raised by voluntary enlistment, for periods of 25 consecutive years for officers and 12 consecutive years for petty officers and enlisted men; replacements shall not exceed 5 per cent per annum of totals; and no officer or man of the mercantile marine shall receive any training in the Navy. (Art. 194, pp. 219–221; p. 82.) All surface warships not in German ports, and all now interned in neutral ports or in the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers, 'cease to belong to Germany, who renounces all rights over them.' (Art. 184, p. 213; p. 79.) Eight named German battleships, 8 named light cruisers, 42 modern destroyers, and 50 modern torpedo boats chosen by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 185, p. 213; p. 79.) Surface warships now under construction are to be broken up (Art. 186, p. 215; p. 80) and certain named auxiliary cruisers and flat auxiliaries are to be disarmed and treated as merchant ships. (Art. 187, p. 215; p. 80.)

"All German submarines, submarine salvage vessels, and docks for submarines, 'including the tubular dock,' are to be delivered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. If any are unfit to proceed under their own power or to be towed to allied ports, they and all others in course of construction are to be broken up. (Art. 188, p. 217; p. 80.)

"No materials derived from any of this breaking up shall be used except for purely industrial or commercial purposes; they may not be sold or disposed of to other countries. (Art. 189, p. 217; p. 81.)

"The construction or acquisition of any submarine even for commercial purposes is forbidden. (Art. 191, p. 219; p. 81.)

"3. Air Clauses:

"The armed forces of Germany must not include any military or naval air forces and no dirigibles shall be kept. (Art. 198, p. 223; p. 83.) All military and naval aeronautical material (except 100 seaplanes, with a spare engine for each to be used in searching for submarine mines), must be delivered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 198, p. 223; p. 83.)

"In addition to the foregoing clauses, others in this Part may be noted as follows:

"Within three months Germany must disclose to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers the nature and mode of manufacture of all explosives, toxic substances, and other like chemical preparations used or prepared for use by them in the war. (Art. 172, p. 201; p. 74.)

"Moreover, the importation into Germany and the manufacture for and export out of Germany of all arms, munitions, and war materials (Art. 170, p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture and importation of asphyxiating, poisonous, or other gases, and all analogous liquids, materials, or devices (Art. 171, p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture and importation into Germany of armored cars, tanks, and similar constructions suitable for use in war (id. p. 199; p. 74), the manufacture for and export from Germany of arms, munitions, or naval war material (Art. 192, p. 219; p. 81), and for a period of six months 'the manufacture and importation of aircraft, engines for aircraft, and parts of engines for aircraft' (Art. 201, p. 225; p. 84) is forbidden.

"All the forgoing clauses are carried out under inter-Allied Commissions (one for military matters, Art. 208, p. 229, p. 85; one for naval, Art. 209, p. 231, p. 86; and one for aeronautics, Art. 210, p. 233, p. 86) whose 'upkeep and cost,' and 'expenses of their work' shall be borne by Germany (Art. 207, p. 229, p. 85), which shall attach a qualified representative to each Commission, and which will give to the Commission 'all necessary facilities for the accomplishment of their missions.' (Art. 206, p. 229, p. 85.) As the end of three months, 'German laws must have been modified and shall be maintained by the German Government in conformity with this part of the present treaty.' (Art. 211, p. 233; p. 87.)

"4. Fortifications:

"No fortification on left bank of Rhine nor on right bank within 50 kilometers of the river. (Art. 42, p. 61; p. 23.)

"No fortifications in plebiscite areas of Kreise of Stuhm and Rosenberg and part of Kreise of aMrienburg, if plebiscite gives them to East Prussia. (Art. 97, p. 147; p. 54.)

"Of Heligoland—destroyed—neither they nor any similar works shall be reconstructed. (Art. 115, pp. 165, 167; p. 61.)

"1. Belgium Boundary Commission:

"A commission composed of seven persons—five appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by Germany, and one by Belgium—will be set up within 15 days from the coming into force of the present Treaty and will settle on the spot the new frontier lines between Belgium and Germany, taking into account the economic factors and means of communication. Decisions will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned. (Art. 35, p. 57; p. 22.)

"2. Saar Basin Boundary Commission:

"A commission composed of five members—one appointed by France, one by Germany, and three by the Council of the League of Nations, which will select nationals of other powers—will be constituted within 15 days from the coming into force of the present Treaty, and will trace on the spot the frontier line prescribed by the Treaty, taking into consideration so far as possible local economic interests and existing communal boundaries. The decisions of this commission will be taken by a majority and will be binding on the parties concerned. (Art. 48, p. 67; p. 24.)

"3. Saar Basin Governing Commission:

"The government of the territory of the Saar Basin shall be entrusted to a commission representing the League of Nations. This commission shall be composed of five members chosen by the Council of the League of Nations—one to be a citizen of France, one a native of the Saar Basin not a citizen of France, and three members belonging to three countries other than France or Germany. The members are appointed for one year and may be reappointed. They may be removed by the Council of the League of Nations, which will refill the positions so vacated. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. II, pars. 16, 17, pp. 77, 79; p. 29.) The chairman, appointed from the members by the Council of the League, will act as the executive of the commission. (Id., par. 18, p. 79; p. 30.)

"Within the territory of the Saar Basin the governing commission shall have all the powers of government hitherto belonging to the German Empire, Prussia, or Bavaria, including the appointment and dismissal of officials and the creation of such administrative and representative bodies as it may deem necessary. It shall have full powers to administer and operate the railroads, canals, and the different public services. Its decisions shall be taken by a majority. (Id., par. 19, p. 79; p. 30.)

"4. Commission of Experts:

"A commission of three experts—one nominated by Germany, one by France, and one, who will be neither a Frenchman or German, by the Council of the League of Nations—the decisions of the experts to be given by a majority, will determine the price in gold which Germany is to pay for France's right of ownership in the Saar Basin coal mines, which may be situated in such part of the territory of the Saar Basin as the League of Nations may decide favors a union with Germany as the result of the plebiscite to be held 15 years from the coming into force of the treaty. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. III, pars. 34, 36, pp. 87, 89; pp. 33, 34.)

"5. Boundary Commission for Czecho-Slovak State:

"The members are appointed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 203, p. 227; p. 85.)

"The number of members or the internal procedure of the commission are not provided for.

"15. Prisoners' Commission:

"A commission composed of representatives of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one part and of the German Government on the other will carry out the repatriation of German prisoners of war and interned civilians.

"For each of the Allied and Associated Powers a subcommission, composed exclusively of representatives of the interested Power and of delegates of the German Government, shall regulate the details of carrying into effect the repatriation of the prisoners of war. (Art. 215, p. 237; p. 88.)

"The repatriation of prisoners of war and interned civilians shall take place as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present treaty and shall be carried out with the greatest rapidity. (Art. 214, p. 237; p. 87.)

"16. Commission on Graves:

"Germany agrees to recognize any commission appointed by an Allied or Associated Government for the purpose of identifying, registering, caring for, or erecting suitable memorials over the graves of soldiers and sailors buried in German territory, and to facilitate the discharge of the duties of such commissions. This provision seems to be reciprocal in favor of Germany. (Art. 225, p. 243; p. 89.)

"17. Commission on Social and State Insurance in Ceded Territory:

"A commission of five members, one appointed by the German Government, one by the other interested Government, and three by the governing body of the International Labor Office from the nationals of other States, shall determine the conditions of transfer of such portions of the reserves accumulated by the Government of the German Empire or of German States, or by public or private organizations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of social or State insurance in ceded territory, unless such transfer has been arranged by special convention within three months after the coming into force of the present treaty. (Art. 312, p. 427, 429; p. 155–156.)

"18. International Commission for the Elbe (Labe) River:

"The Elbe (Labe) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission which shall comprise four representatives of the German States bordering on the river, two representatives of the Czecho-Slovak State, one representative of Great Britain, one representative of France, one representative of Italy, and one representative of Belgium. Whatever be the number of members present, each delegation shall have the right to record a number of votes equal to the number of representatives allotted to it. If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 340, p. 451; p. 164.)

"This commission shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations (Art. 343, p. 453; p. 164), which project shall designate the headquarters of the commission, prescribe the manner in which its president is to be nominated, specify the extent of the commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and improvements on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges and regulations for navigation, and shall define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied. (Art. 344, p. 453; p. 165.)

"19. International Commission for the Oder (Odra) River:

"The Oder (Odra) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission which shall comprise one representative of Poland, three representatives of Prussia, one representative of the Czecho-Slovak State, one representative of Great Britain, one representative of France, one representative of Denmark, and one representative of Sweden.

"If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 341, p. 451; p. 164.)

"This commission shall proceed immediately to prepare a project for the revision of existing international agreements and regulations (Art. 343, p. 453; p. 164), which project shall designate the headquarters of the commission, prescribe the manner in which its President is to be nominated, specify the extent of the commission's powers, particularly in regard to the execution of works of maintenance, control, and river improvements on the river system, the financial régime, the fixing and collection of charges and regulations for navigation, and shall define the sections of the river or its tributaries to which the international régime shall be applied. (Art. 344, p. 453; p. 165.)

"20. International Commission of the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) River:

"Upon request to the League of Nations by any riparian State, the Niemen (Russstrom-Memel-Niemen) shall be placed under the administration of an international commission, which shall comprise one representative of each riparian State and three representatives of other States specified by the League of Nations. (Art. 342, p. 453; p. 164.)

"21. International Commission for the Danube System:

"A commission shall be appointed composed of two representatives of German riparian States, one representative of each other riparian State, and one representative of each non-riparian represented in the future on the European Commission of the Danube, and shall be placed in charge of the administration of the Danube system referred to in Article 331 (p. 443; p. 161).

"If certain of these representatives can not be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the commission shall nevertheless be valid. (Art. 347, p. 455; p. 165.)

"This commission shall undertake provisionally the administration of the river in conformity with the principles of Articles 332 to 337 (pp. 445–447; pp. 161, 162) until such time as a definite statute regarding the Danube is concluded by the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 348, p. 455; p. 165.) This conference will be of the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 349, p. 457; p. 166.)

"22. Commission Free Zones in Northern Ports:

"A commission consisting of one delegate of Germany, one delegate of the Czecho-Slovak State, and one delegate of Great Britain shall decide as to the delimitation of the free zones in Hamburg and Stettin, which Germany shall lease to the Czecho-Slovak State for a period of 99 years (Art. 363, p. 469; p. 170) and the equipment of such areas, their exploitation, and in general all conditions for their utilization, including the amount of the rental. Such conditions shall be susceptible of revision every 10 years in the same manner and Germany declares in advance that she will adhere to the decisions so taken. (Art. 364, p. 471; p. 170.)

"23. Commission of Experts on Railways:

"Commission of Experts on Railways designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Germany shall be represented, shall as regards railway lines, ceded by Germany to States obtaining part of her territory, where said railway lines have no special rolling stock, fix the proportion of the stock existing on the system to which the lines belong, which Germany shall hand over to the ceded system. These commissions shall also specify the locomotives, 'carriages,' and 'wagons' to be handed over in each case; they shall decide upon the conditions of their acceptance and shall make the provisional arrangement necessary to ensure their repair in German workshops. (Art. 371, p. 477; p. 173.)

"The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of any subsequent agreement to the contrary, the chairman of any commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote. (Art. 437, p. 533; p. 19.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 4.

"THE REPARATION COMMISSION.

"1. Constitution and Personnel of the Commission (Art. 244, Annex II, p. 261 et seq.; p. 96, et seq.):

"Each of the Powers named below will appoint one delegate and also one assistant delegate, who takes the delegate's place in case of the latter's illness or necessary absence, the assistant delegate at other times having merely the right to be present at proceedings without taking any part therein.

"These powers are the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State. On no occasion shall more than five of the Powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the commission and record votes, and the delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Italy shall have the right on all occasions. The delegate of Belgium shall sit whenever the delegate of Japan (who sits on questions relating to damage at sea and the condemnation of concessions in Russia, China, etc., Art. 260, p. 117; p. 116, or the delegate of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, who sits on questions relating to Austria, Hungary, or Bulgaria) does not sit.

"Any Government represented on the commission may withdraw upon 12 months' notice filed with the commission, the notice being confirmed in the course of the sixth month after the date of the original notice.

"Other interested Allied and Associated Powers may appoint a delegate to be present and act as assessor in respect to that Power's claims and interests when under examination or discussion, but the assessor has no right to vote.

"Proceedings of the commission are private unless the commission otherwise determines.

"There shall be a chairman or vice chairman of the commission holding office for one year and eligible for reelection.

"The German Government will accord to the members of the commission and its authorized agents the same rights and immunities as are enjoyed in Germany by duly accredited diplomatic agents of friendly Powers and will pay the salaries and expenses of the commission and of its staff. (Art. 240, p. 255; p. 94.)

"A member of the commission is responsible to his own Government for his acts of omission or commission, and no Allied or Associated Government assumes any responsibility in respect to any other Government.

"The commission shall be dissolved when all the amounts due from Germany and her Allies under the present Treaty or the decisions of the commission have been discharged and all sums received, or their equivalents shall have been distributed to the Powers interested. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 23, p. 277; p. 101.)

"Powers and Jurisdiction of the Commission (Art. 244, Annex II, p. 261; p. 96):

"The commission is not bound by any code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence of procedure, 'but shall be guided by justice, equity, and good faith.' Cases involving the same principles and rules should be similarly decided. The commission will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims and will act on any trustworthy modes of computation. (Par. 11.)

"The commission has the right to appoint all necessary officers, agents, and employees requisite for the executions of its functions and fix their remuneration; may constitute committees, whose members need not be members of the commission; take all executive steps necessary for the discharge of its duties; and delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents, and committees. (Par. 7.)

"'The commission shall in general have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this part of the present Treaty and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, the commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above (those appointing delegates and assessors) as the exclusive agency of the said Governments, respectively, for receiving, selling, holding, and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Germany under this part of the present Treaty.' (Par. 12.)

"The Reparation Commission determines the amount of damage for which compensation is to be made by Germany after giving the German Government a 'just opportunity' to be heard (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92), but Germany may take no part in the decisions of the commission, which shall also afford a similar opportunity to the Allies of Germany when it shall consider that their interests are in question. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 10, p. 265; p. 97.)

"The following additional functions are worthy of note:

"The Reparation Commission shall—

"Draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging the entire obligation within a period of 30 years from May 1, 1921. (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92.)

"Determine in its discretion when and to what extent the payments of Germany shall be extended or modified (Arts. 233, 234, p. 251; p. 92), and shall hear evidence and arguments on the part of Germany on any questions connected with her capacity to pay. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 9, p. 265; p. 97.)

"Determine within the limits of rules laid down the amount of bonds or other obligations which Germany shall issue and as to when they shall be issued, which bonds are to be both a guarantee and an acknowledgment of the debt they cover. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12, p. 269, et seq.; p. 99.)

"Lay down the procedure under which shall be restored cash and property seized or sequestrated by Germany during the war. (Art. 238, p. 255; p. 93.)

"Receive from Germany the merchant ships and fishing boats which she must deliver. (Art. 244, Annex III, p. 277; p. 102.)

"Determines the specifications of the ships to be built by Germany for the account of the Allied and Associated Governments, the conditions under which they are to be built and delivered, the price per ton at which they are to be accounted for by the Reparation Commission, and all other questions relating to the accounting, ordering, building, and delivery of the ships. (Id., p. 279; p. 103.)

"Take title to that portion of the German River fleet which is turned over to make good the losses incurred during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers. (Id., p. 281; p. 103.)

"Consider the lists filed with it by the Allied and Associated Governments showing animals, machinery, equipment, tools, and like articles of a commercial character, which have been seized, consumed, or destroyed by Germany, or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations, which the Governments desire to have restored for meeting their immediate and urgent needs, as also of reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture and like articles which the powers desire to have produced and manufactured in Germany and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of the invaded areas. The commission shall then determine the amount and number of materials and animals mentioned in the lists which Germany is to be required to furnish. (Id., Annex IV, pp. 283, 285; p. 104–105.)

"Give the representatives of the German Government an opportunity and a time to be heard on their ability to furnish such materials, articles, and animals. (Id., p. 287; p. 105.)

"Determine the value to be attributed to such materials, articles, and animals and the amount thereof to be credited against the reparation account. (Id., p. 287; p. 105.)

"Pass upon the amount of coal which Germany should be called upon to furnish under the options granted in the Treaty, as also the replacement of coke for coal, the delivery of benzol, coal tar, and sulphate of ammonia. (Art. 244, Annex V, p. 291, et seq.; p. 106, et seq.)

"Have the right to require the delivery of 50 per cent of the total stock of each and every kind of dyestuff and chemical drug in Germany or under German control at the date of the coming into force of the treaty, the price to be paid for such dyestuffs and so to be credited against the reparation account to be fixed by the commission. (Art. 244, Annex VI, p. 295, et seq.; p. 108.) Germany also agrees to deliver during any six months period up to January 1, 1925, up to 25 per cent of the German production of such dyestuffs and chemicals produced during the preceding six months, or 25 per cent of the normal production. (Id., par. 2, p. 297; p. 109.)

"Have the power to make exceptions to the priority distribution provided by the Treaty for the revenue of the German Empire and its constituent States. (Art. 248, p. 305; p. 111.)

"Determine the amount of the public debt (Empire or State) which cessionary States shall assume in respect to the territorial areas ceded to them, as also the method of discharging such obligation. (Art. 254, p. 309; p. 113.)

"Fix the value of all State property ceded by the Treaty to the Allied and Associated Powers, which property shall include the private property of the former German Emperor and other royal personages, such value to be paid by the acquiring States to the Reparation Commission for credit on the reparation account in favor of the German Government. (Art. 256, p. 311; p. 114.)

"May demand that the German Government become possessed of rights and interests of German nationals in public utilities and concessions in Russia, China, Turkey, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria or in the possessions or dependencies of these States or any territory formerly belonging to Germany or her allies to be ceded by Germany or her allies to any Power or to be administered by a mandatory under the present Treaty; and may require the German Government to transfer all such rights and interests to the Reparation Commission, which shall credit Germany on the reparation account the value of said rights and interests as assessed by itself. (Art. 260, p. 317; p. 116.)

"Is authorized to accept on account of the bill against Germany for the total amount of her damage (which shall be concluded and notified to the German Government on or before May 1, 1921, as representing the extent of the Government's obligations) (Art. 233, p. 251; p. 92) chattels, properties, commodities, businesses, rights, concessions, within or without German territory, ships, bonds, shares or securities of any kind, or currencies of Germany or other States, the value of such substitutes for gold being fixed at a fair and just amount by the commission itself, which shall have due regard in accepting such payments, for any legal or equitable interests of the Allied and Associated Powers or of neutral Powers or of their nationals therein. (Art. 244, Annex II, pars. 19, 20, p. 275; p. 101.)

"Determine the debt Belgium owes to the Allied and Associated Powers, incurred up to November 11, 1918, with interest at 5 per cent, and accept German bonds for this amount. (Art. 232, p. 249; p. 91.)

"Make decisions regarding cancellation of German debt (Art. 234, p. 251, p. 92; Art. 244, Annex II, par. 13, p. 271; p. 99), accompanied by a statement of reasons (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (f), p. 269, p. 99), but any cancellation must be with the specific authority of the several Governments represented upon the commission. (Art. 234, p. 251; p. 92.)

"Require information from German Government relative to financial situation and operation and to the property productive capacity, and stocks and current production of raw materials and manufactured articles of Germany and her nationals, also information regarding military operations. (Art. 240, p. 255; p. 94.)

"Determine credits to be made to Germany on account of transfers, rights, concessions, or other interests not specifically covered. (Art. 243, p. 257; p. 94.)

"Must take bonds and undertakings from Germany as stipulated. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 12 (c), p. 267; p. 98.)

"May take into account in fixing total amount of debt against Germany, interest due on sums arising out of the reparation of material damages as from November 11, 1918, up to May 1, 1921. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 16, p. 273; p. 100.)

"Make recommendation of action to be taken against Germany in case of default by Germany in performance of any obligation imposed by Part VIII. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 17, p. 273; p. 100; and see Art. 430, p. 521; p. 189.)

"Indicate to German Government measures to be taken by it to secure full title to ships transferred to neutral flags during war, or now in process of such transfer without consent of Allied or Associated Governments. (Art. 244, Annex III, par. 7, p. 281; p. 103.)

"Determine amounts representing expenditures by the German Empire or States upon the Government properties referred to in Article 256. (Art. 255, p. 311; p. 113.)

"Determine value of Saar Basin property ceded to France. (Art. 50, Annex, Chap. I., par. 5, p. 71; p. 27.)

"Determine amount of German debt arising from measures adopted by the German and Prussian Governments with a view to German colonization of Poland. (Art. 92, p. 137; p. 51.)

"Approve estimates of French Government relating to deposits, credits, and advances effected under the agreements dealing with Equatorial Africa. (Art. 125, p. 171; p. 64.)

"Determine value of buildings, forests, and other State property which belonged to former Kingdom of Poland. (Art. 92, p. 137; p. 51.)

"Determine value of Germany's portion of the capital of the State Bank of Morocco. (Art. 145, p. 183; p. 68.)

"All proceedings of the commission shall be private, unless on particular occasions the commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons. (Art. 244, Annex II, par. 8, p. 265; p. 97.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 5.

"CLEARING OFFICES.

"Property, rights, and interests, including pecuniary obligations of German nationals in allied and associated countries and of the nationals of the Allied and Associated countries in Germany.

"[See generally Part X, Sec. III, pp. 347–367, pp. 127–133, and Sec. IV, pp. 367–385, pp. 134–141.]

"First. As to the property of German nationals in Allied and Associated territory:

"Under the Treaty the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights, and interests belonging at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to German nationals, or companies controlled by them, within their territories, colonies, possessions, and protectorates, including territory ceded to them by the present Treaty, this liquidation to be carried out in accordance with the laws of the allied or associated state concerned, the price to be fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated. Proceeds of industrial property dealt with in the same way, unless legislation in force at the time of signature of treaty, otherwise directs. (Art. 306, p. 417; p. 152.) The German owner shall not be able to dispose of his property, right, or interests, nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of the State in which the property is located. (Art. 297 (b), p. 367; p. 134.)

"The Treaty also provides that as between the Allied and Associated Powers or their nationals on the one hand and Germany or her nationals on the other hand all the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer (both of which terms are defined in the Treaty, see Art. 298, Annex, par. 3 and 4, p. 377, 379, p. 138, and cover roughly activities such as those of the Alien Property Custodian in the United States) or acts done or to be done in execution of such measures as defined in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex to Article 298 (pp. 375–377; pp. 137–138) shall be considered as final and binding upon all persons except as regards the reservations laid down in the Treaty.

"Paragraph 1 (p. 375; p. 137) of the Annex above mentioned amplifies this confirmation of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer by the powers (and as to the provisions of paragraph 1, of Germany also). Paragraph 2 (p. 377; p. 137) provides further that no claim or action shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or department of the Government of such a Power by Germany or by any German national wherever resident in respect of any action or omission with regard to his property, right, or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect of any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws, or regulations of any Allied or Associated Power.

"The property, rights, and interests of German nationals will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them pursuant to the authorization above recited until the complete liquidation therein contemplated has been completed. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 9, p. 381; p. 139.)

"Furthermore all investments wheresoever effected with the cash assets of the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy property or having control over such administration or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever, shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any such investments. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 12, p. 383; p. 140.)

"Again compensation in respect of damages or injuries inflicted upon the property of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers in Germany may be charged upon the property of German nationals within the territory or under the control of the creditor national's State. This German property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. The payment of the compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated State and the amount will be debited to Germany. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134.)

"Finally Germany undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sales or retention of their property, rights, or interests in Allied or Associated States. (Art. 297 (i), p. 373, p. 136.)

"Second. The property of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers of Germany:

"In the first place the exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined as already indicated), taken by Germany with respect to the property, rights, and interests of the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights, and interests concerned restored to their owners who shall enjoy full rights therein as provided in the Treaty. (Art. 297 (a), p. 367; p. 134.)

"As to the confirmation (of paragraph 1 of the Annex to Art. 298, p. 375; p. 137) of the complete acts of the German Government instrumentalities (equivalent to the American Alien Property Custodian) there is this proviso: This confirmation will not apply to such of the measures mentioned as have been taken by the German authorities in invaded or occupied territory, nor to such of the mentioned measures as have been taken by Germany or the German authorities since November 11, 1918, all of which shall be void. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 1, p. 377; p. 137.)

"As to the property and rights of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights, or interests were not applied before the signature of the armistice the following procedure may be had. (Art. 297 (f) (g), pp. 369–371; p. 135.)

"Whenever a national of such a power is entitled to property which has been subjected to a measure of transfer in German territory, and expresses a desire for its restitution, his claim for compensation shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property, if it still exists in specie, free from any encumbrances or burdens with which it may have been charged after the liquidation, all third parties injured by the restitution being indemnified. Allied and Associated Powers must specify the property, rights, and interests as to which they intend to exercise this right of restitution which will be carried out by order of the German Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 7, p. 381; p. 139.)

"As to all such property, rights, and interests so restored Germany undertakes to restore and maintain such property in the legal position obtaining in respect of the property, rights, and interests of German nationals under the laws in force before the war, and not to subject any such property, rights, or interests to any measures in derogation of property rights which will not apply equally to property, rights, and interests of German nationals and to pay adequate compensation in the event of the application of these measures. (Art. 298, p. 373; p. 136.) These provisions apply also to property as to which exceptional war measures of transfer have been discontinued.

"Furthermore, the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damages or injury inflicted upon their property, rights, or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested in German territory as it existed on August 1, 1914, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI of Part X or by an arbitrator appointed by that tribunal. (Art. 297 (e), p. 369; p. 134.)

"Finally, Germany must, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to each Allied or Associated Power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights, or interests situated in the territory of that Allied or Associated Power, including any bonds, stocks, debentures, debenture stocks, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that power. (Art. 298, Annex, par. 10, p. 383; p. 139.)

"In brief, Germany is to cease all exceptional war measures and measures of transfer and restore to the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers their property affected thereby; is to restore any of their property still existing in specie; is to grant compensation for all damages or injuries inflicted upon their property; and is to deliver to each of the Powers the securities held by Germans of any company created under the laws of the Power.

"Third. Disposition of the proceeds of enemy property:

"The net proceeds of the sales of enemy property, rights, or interests wherever situated carried out either by virtue of war legislation or by the application of the provisions of Article 297, and in general all cash assets of enemies shall be dealt with as follows:

"Two plans are provided—one for those not adopting the provisions of Section III and the Annex thereto (Part X) and the other that provided for by said section. (Art. 297 (h–1, 2) p. 371; p. 135.)

"A. Plan to be followed by those not adopting Section III of Part X:

"(1) Property of the nationals of Allied or Associated Governments held by Germany.

"The proceeds of property, rights, and interests and the cash assets of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Germany shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government. (Art. 297 (h–2), p. 371; p. 135).

"(2) Property of German nationals held by Allied or Associated Powers.

"The proceeds of property, rights, and interests and the cash assets of German nationals received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such power in accordance with its laws and regulations and may be applied in payment of claims and debts defined by this article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. (Art. 297 (h–2), p. 371; p. 135.)

"The provisions of paragraph 4 referred to are as follows:

"All property, rights, and interests of German nationals within the territory of any Allied or Associated Power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealing therewith may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested in German territory, or debts owing to them by German nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the German Government or by any German authorities since July 31, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by Mr. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights, and interests in the territory of other enemy powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied." (Art. 298, Annex, par. 4, p. 379; p. 138.)

"Any property, rights, and interests or proceeds thereof or cash assets not used as above provided may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power, and if retained the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in Article 243 (p. 257; p. 94)—that is to say, it will be credited to Germany in respect of her reparation obligations. (Art. 297 (h–2), p. 371; p. 135; and see Arts. 242, 243, p. 257; p. 94.)

"Liquidation effected in new States signatories of the present Treaty or in States which are not entitled to share in the reparation payments to be made by Germany. The proceeds of liquidations effected by such States shall, subject to the rights of the Reparation Commission under the present Treaty, particularly under Articles 235 (p. 253; p. 93) and 260 (p. 317; p. 116), be paid direct to the owner. If the owner be not satisfied and apply to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, such tribunal shall itself or by an arbitrator examine the case and if satisfied that the conditions of the sale or measures taken by the Government of the State in question outside its general legislation were unfairly prejudicial to the price obtained shall have discretion to award to the owner equitable compensation to be paid by that State. (Art. 297 (h–2), p. 373; p. 136.)

"B. Powers adopting Section III (p. 347; p. 127) and the Annex thereto proceed as follows:

"It is in the first place to be observed that this section is entitled 'Debts' and apparently relates, primarily at least, only to the settlement and adjustment of debts between German nationals and the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers. It does not appear clear in what manner property, rights, and interests other than debts, which are covered by Section IV, which follows (p. 367; p. 134), are to be adjusted under Section III, although the plan for adjustment under Section IV is reasonably clear, and it seems in contemplation (Art. 296, p. 349; p. 127) that such property, rights, and interests mentioned in Section IV shall be accounted for under this procedure. Moreover, the class of debts which may be adjusted under this section are confined to the following (Art. 296, p. 347; p. 127):

"1. Debts payable before the war and running from a national of one of the Contracting Powers residing within its territory and due to a national of an Opposing Power residing within its territory;

"2. Debts which became payable during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers residing within its territory and arose out of transactions or contracts with the nationals of an Opposing Power, resident within its territory, of which the total or partial execution was suspended on account of the declaration of war;

"3. Interest which has accrued due before and during the war to a national of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by an Opposing Power, provided that the payment of interest on such securities to the nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war;

"4. Capital sums which have become payable before and during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by one of the Opposing Powers, provided that the payments of such capital sums to nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war.

"The settlement of these debts is accomplished under the following principles and plan:

"A. Each Government guarantees the payment of all such debts of its nationals except where the debtor was in a state of bankruptcy before the war or had given formal indication of insolvency or where the debt was due by a company whose business had been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. This does not apply to territory invaded or occupied by the enemy before the armistice. (Art. 296 (b), p. 349; p. 127.) This guaranty is effective whenever for any reason a debt is not recoverable because of the reasons above mentioned or where the debt has been barred by the statute of limitations in force in the debtor's country. (Id., Annex, par. 4, p. 355; p. 129.)

"Within six months of the establishment of the Clearing Office, creditors must give notice of debts due them, and shall furnish the office with any document and information required of them. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.)

"A debtor Clearing House must credit a Creditor Clearing House with every debt admitted by the debtor even though it be unable to collect it. The Government concerned will, nevertheless, invest their respective Clearing Offices with all necessary powers for the recovery of debts which have been admitted. (Id., par. 14, p. 359; p. 131.)

"B. Each of the High Contracting Parties shall prohibit, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, both the payment and the acceptance of payment of such debts and also of communications between the interested parties with regard to the adjustment of said debts otherwise than through the Clearing Offices to be established. (Art. 296 (a), p. 349; p. 127.) Violations of this prohibition shall be punished with the same penalties which are provided by legislation for trading with the enemy (id., Annex, par. 3, p. 353; p. 129), and the parties to the Treaty agree to take all suitable measures to trace and punish collusion between enemy creditors and debtors and to communicate one with another any evidence and information which might help the discovery and punishment of such collusion. (Id., Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.) Moreover, each country must prohibit within its territory all legal processes relating to the payment of enemy debts except in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty. (Id., par. 3, p. 353; p. 129.)

"C. Each country shall establish a Clearing Office for the collection and payment of debts due to its nationals and for the collection for payment of debts due from its nationals to nationals of the opposing party. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 1, p. 353; p. 128.) It moreover appears that by agreement between the Allied and Associated Powers, these Clearing Offices may similarly act with reference to the nationals of one resident in the other; that is, an American Clearing Office could act in the settlement of a debt running from a German to a Frenchman resident in the United States. (Art. 296 (f), p. 353; p. 128.)

"In appointing the personnel of a Clearing Office or of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal due regard shall be paid to the knowledge possessed by the personnel of the language of the other country concerned. (Id., Annex, par. 21, p. 363; p. 132.)

"D. Each Clearing Office is both a debtor Clearing Office and a Creditor Clearing Office. As a creditor Clearing Office it notifies the Clearing Office of the other country (which for this purpose is a debtor Clearing Office) of all the debts which have been declared against the other Clearing Office. (Id., Annex, par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.) As a debtor Clearing Office it informs the Clearing Office of the other country (which for that purpose is a Creditor Clearing Office) of all debts which have been admitted and of debts which are contested, in the latter case giving the grounds for the nonadmission of the debts. (Id.)

"Or, differently stated, the American Clearing Office notifies the German Clearing Office of all debts claimed by American citizens against Germans and of all claims admitted by American citizens in favor of Germans; and the German Clearing Office notifies the American Clearing Office of all debts admitted by Germans in favor of Americans and of all claims made by Germans against Americans.

"If any person makes a claim which in whole or in part is not admitted, he must pay by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent on the part not admitted. If any person denies liability of the whole or part of a debt claimed he shall pay by way of fine interest at 5 per cent on the amount with regard to which his refusal is disallowed. (Id., par. 10, p. 357; p. 130.) The amount recovered from these fines applies on the expenses of the Clearing Office. (Id.)

"Where any debt is not admitted in whole or in part, the two Clearing Offices (debtor and creditor) examine the matter jointly and endeavor to bring the parties to an agreement. (Id., par. 8, p. 357; p. 130.) Seemingly, if creditor and debtor are unable to reach an agreement, the two Clearing Offices may undertake to reach an agreement. (Id., par. 16, p. 361; p. 131.)

"If the Clearing Offices do not reach an agreement, the dispute shall be either referred to arbitration on terms agreed to by the parties or referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in the Treaty. However, if the creditor Clearing Office so requests, the dispute shall be submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of the place of domicile of the debtor (that is, an American claim would go to the German courts). (Id., par. 16, p. 361; p. 131.) Sums found due by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal or by the court or the tribunal agreed to by the parties shall be recovered through the Clearing Office, as if the sums were debts admitted by the debtor Clearing Office. (Id., par. 17, p. 361; p. 132.) In case an appeal is taken to the Mixed Tribunal from a decision of the Clearing Office, the appellant shall make a deposit against the costs. A fee of 5 per cent of the amount in dispute shall be charged in respect of all cases brought before the Mixed Tribunal and shall unless the tribunal directs otherwise be borne by the unsuccessful party. 'Such fee shall be added to the deposit referred to.' (Id., par. 20, p. 363; p. 132.)

"If the Clearing Offices or the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal hold that the claim does not fall within Article 296 (p. 347; p. 127), the creditor may prosecute the claim before the courts or otherwise as he may wish. (Id., par. 23, p. 365; p. 133.)

"Persons who have suffered injuries from acts of war and who admit owing debts shall not have their debts charged against them until the compensation due to such persons concerned in respect of such injuries has been paid. (Id., par. 14, p. 359; p. 131.)

"Unless an agreement otherwise is reached by the Governments concerned, debts shall carry interest in accordance with rules set out in the Treaty. (Id., par. 22, p. 363; p. 133.)

"Balances between the Clearing Offices shall be struck monthly and the credit balance paid in cash by the debtor State within a week. (Id., par. 11, p. 359; p. 131.)

"Statutes of limitation are suspended from the time of the presentation of the claim to the Clearing Office. (Id., par. 23, p. 365; p. 133.)

"Each Government defrays the expenses of the Clearing Office set up in its territory, including the salaries of the staff. (Id., par. 15, p. 361; p. 131.) Fines that may be levied (as above provided) are credited by the Clearing Office collecting them, which is responsible therefor to the other Clearing Office 'which shall retain them as a contribution towards the costs of carrying out the present provisions.' (Id., par. 10, p. 357; p. 130.) The expenses for postal and telegraphic communication through the intervention of the Clearing Offices by the debtors and creditors desirous of coming to agreement as to the amount of their debts shall be borne by the parties concerned. (Id., par. 5, p. 355; p. 129.)

"Debts shall be paid or credited in the currency of such one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, of the British Dominions, of India, as may be concerned. If the debts are payable in some other currency, they shall be paid or credited in the currency of the country concerned, whether Allied or Associated Power, colony, protectorate, British Dominion, or India, at the prewar rate of exchange, which the treaty defines. If a contract provides for a fixed rate of exchange in the transaction, then the above provisions concerning the rate of exchange shall not apply. (Art. 296 (d), p. 351; p. 128.)

"The foregoing provisions may, however (as to matters provided for in Art. 297), be rendered inapplicable by notice to that effect to Germany on the part of the Allied or Associated Power concerned within six months of the coming into force of the present treaty. (Art. 296 (e), p. 351; p. 128.)

"The creditor Clearing Office pays to the individual creditor the sums due him out of the funds placed at its disposal by its own Government. (Art. 296, Annex, par. 9, p. 357; p. 130.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 6.

"MIXED ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL.

"[Art. 304, and Annex, pp. 409–415; pp. 149–151.]

"Within three months of the coming into force of this treaty, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall be established by each of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Germany on the other. Each tribunal is to consist of three members, one appointed by Germany, one appointed by the Allied and Associated Powers concerned, and the third, who is to be the president of the tribunal, shall be chosen by agreement of the two Governments, or that failing, by the Council of the League of Nations, and until that is set up, by M. Gustave Ador. The Council of the League and Mr. Ador shall name two other persons who may take the place of the president in case of need, and all three persons named by either of them must be nationals of powers who were neutral during the war.

"Where the number of cases before a tribunal justifies it, the personnel may be increased, and the tribunal may then sit in divisions.

"In case vacancies in personnel are not filled by the Governments concerned within one month, the members shall be chosen by the other Government from the two persons named as alternates for the presidency.

"Decisions shall be reached by a majority vote and shall be final.

"The jurisdiction of the tribunal shall relate to cases coming up to it from the Clearing Offices (provided for in Part X, Section III); cases in reference to compensation for damage done to nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers in Germany and also the adjustment of claims of nationals of new States and of States not entitled to share in the reparation payments made by Germany, and to cases arising under Sections V and III of Part X, none of which latter concern the United States because of reservations made in the Treaty.

"Each tribunal determines its own procedure, except as provided in the Annex to Article 304, which establishes the tribunal.

"Each Government pays the expenses of its own representative upon the tribunal and a proportionate part of the joint expenses, including the compensation, etc., of the president.

"The national courts of each of the parties are required to render all assistance in their power, particularly as regards transmitting notices and collecting evidence.

"There are no rules of law laid down by which the tribunals are to be guided, and the procedure is practically unprovided for on all matters pertaining thereto, except that it is stipulated that 'The tribunal shall decide all questions and matters submitted upon such evidence and information as may be furnished by the parties concerned.'

"The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall unless otherwise agreed be English, French, Italian, or Japanese, as may be determined by the Allied or Associated Power concerned.

"MEMORANDUM NO. 7.

"ADDITIONAL CONVENTIONS OR AGREEMENTS TO BE MADE.

"1. A further agreement to be made between France and Germany, dealing with the interests of the inhabitants of territories ceded to Germany in 1871. (Art. 53, p. 93; p. 35.)

"2. A special convention to determine the conditions for repayment, in marks, of the exceptional war expenditures advanced during the course of the war by Alsace-Lorraine, or by public bodies in Alsace-Lorraine. (Art. 58, p. 97; p. 36.)

"3. A special convention between France and Germany which shall be submitted to the approval of the Central Rhine Commission to fix the details particularly as regards financing of the administration of the port of Strasbourg and the port of Kehl. (Art. 65, p. 101; p. 38.)

"4. An agreement establishing frontier railway stations, it being stipulated in advance that on the Rhine frontier they shall be situated on the right bank. (Art. 67, p. 103; p. 39.)

"5. A special convention to determine the conditions and procedure of transferring of funds covering social insurance from the German Government to the French Government. (Art. 77, p. 111; p. 42.)

"6. A special convention between France and Germany, settling all questions not covered by the Treaty, as to competence, procedure, or administration of justice. (Art. 78, p. 113; p. 42.)

"7. Further convention between France and Germany covering all questions concerning Alsace-Lorraine, which are not regulated by Section V, and the Annex thereto of Part III, or by the general provisions of the Treaty. (Art. 79, p. 113; p. 42.)

"8. Subsequent agreements to decide questions not decided by the present Treaty which may arise in consequence of the cession of German territory to the Czecho-Slovak State. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"9. A treaty between the Czecho-Slovak State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, containing the provisions deemed necessary by the Powers to protect the inhabitants of the Czecho-Slovak State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"10. A treaty between the Czecho-Slovak State and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, containing such provisions as the Powers deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment of the commerce of other nations. (Art. 86, p. 123; p. 46.)

"11. A treaty between Poland and the Principal Allied and Associated Powers containing provisions deemed necessary by the Powers to protect the interests of the inhabitants of Poland who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion. (Art. 93, p. 139; p. 52.)

"13. Convention between Germany and Poland (differences to be settled by the Council of the League of Nations) securing to Germany and to Poland, respectively, full and adequate railroad, telegraphic, and telephonic facilities over one another's territories. (Art. 98, p. 147; p. 55.)

"14. An agreement between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers of the one part, the Polish Government of another part, and the Free City of Danzig of a third part, relating to customs, use of waterways, docks, basins, wharves, etc., railway administration, postal, telegraphic, and telephonic communications; to provide against discrimination within the Free City of Danzig to the detriment of citizens of Poland, and other persons of Polish origin or speech; to provide that the foreign affairs of the Free City of Danzig shall be taken care of by the Polish Government. (Art. 104, p. 153; p. 57.)

"15. Further agreements to settle all other questions which may arise from the cession of territory made by Germany to the Principal Allies and Associated Powers, in establishing the Free City of Danzig. (Art. 108, p. 155; p. 58.)

"16. International agreements between the Allied and Associated Powers and the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, fixing their relations. (Art. 40, p. 61; p. 23.)

"17. Special agreements regarding the interest on debts (these not necessarily entered into.) (Art. 296, Annex, par. 22, p. 363; p. 133.)

"18. Special conventions between the German Government and the Governments concerned covering social and State insurance in ceded territory. (Art. 312, p. 427; p. 156.)

"19. General convention drawn up by the Allied and Associated Powers, and approved by the League of Nations, relating to waterways recognized in such convention as having international character. (Art. 338, p. 449; p. 163.)

"20. Régime for the Danube, formulated by a conference of the Powers. (Art. 349, p. 457; p. 166.)

"21. Revision of the convention of Mannheim. (Art. 354, p. 459; p. 166.)

"22. A new convention to replace the Berne convention of 1890, covering the transportation of passengers, luggage, and goods by rail. (Art. 366, p. 473; p. 171.)

"23. General conventions regarding the international régime of transit, waterways, ports, or railways, which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the approval of the League of Nations. (Art. 379, p. 483; p. 175.)

"24. Subsequent agreements covering all matters, not covered by the present Treaty, relating to the occupation of German territory by troops of the Allied and Associated Governments. (Art. 432, p. 521; p. 189.)

"(And see Table, Section VIII, Germany consents beforehand to any other treaties which the Allied or Associated Powers may make.)

"MEMORANDUM NO. 8.

"CONVENTION OR AGREEMENTS MADE BUT NOT SUBMITTED.

"2. Convention relative to aerial navigation concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers. (Art. 319, p. 433; p. 157.)"

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Capper	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Sterling
Chamberlain	King	Page	Sutherland
Colt	Kirby	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Lenroot	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	McCormick	Robinson	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	McNary	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Harrison	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Watson
Henderson	Norris	Smith, Md.	Williams
Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Smoot
Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Spencer

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LA FOLLETTE answered to his name when called.

Mr. MCCUMBER entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. ASHURST entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the RECORD should show that Senators GRONNA, KENYON, RANSDELL, KENDRICK, WADSWORTH, and FRANCE, and also Senator KEYES, have been engaged for a number of days in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry investigating the packers and other matters. They are having a hearing this morning, and their absence from the Senate is occasioned by the fact that they are busily engaged in that investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. That is also the case with the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not see why the Sergeant at Arms can not go to those committees and get the Members to come here in order to make a quorum.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

Mr. HARRISON. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are absent on public business.

Mr. KIRBY. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] on public business.

Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KENYON, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES] is absent by reason of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On yesterday the Senate concurred in a resolution of the House of Representatives for the appointment of a joint committee, consisting of five Senators and seven Members of the House, to make arrangements for appropriate exercises on the welcoming of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in the World War. Pursuant to that concurrent resolution the Chair appoints on behalf of the Senate the following Members: Mr. WADSWORTH, of New York; Mr. WARREN, of Wyoming; Mr. SPENCER, of Missouri; Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon; and Mr. THOMAS, of Colorado.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the concurrent resolution of the Senate extending the time for the report of the joint special committee relative to the contemplated observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EDWARD JOHNSON.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2469) for the relief of Edward Johnson, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 164) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2904) relating to manufactured articles intended for interstate commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. GAY:

A bill (S. 2905) for the relief of Joseph A. Prat; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. CHAMBERLAIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

RECESS UNTIL TUESDAY.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that when the Senate takes a recess today it be until 11 o'clock a. m. on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, during the last few days I have received a number of telegrams from New Mexico which reveal a situation very alarming if the information which the senders of these telegrams give is correct. One from the acting governor of the State, under date of August 27, says:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington:

Oil-leasing bill now before Senate very disastrous to New Mexico, especially section 30. Six thousand of claims approved this year will be void for lack of discovery. Do all in your power to protect our interests here.

BENJ. PANKEY, Acting Governor.

Another telegram from Alamogordo, N. Mex., is as follows:

ALAMOGORDO, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Oil-leasing bill before Senate will result in great loss to people here who have made locations in good faith. Some are drilling and others have spent a large amount getting ready to drill. Suggest that bill be amended to protect all locations made during present year, regardless of discovery.

Bob Woodworth, president; Tom Charles, secretary; W. C. Haynes, F. C. Rolland, J. W. Fetz, G. F. Rousseau, Jos. Heslep, G. B. Oliver, W. W. Man, R. S. Tiptonn, T. B. Oliver, A. C. Menger, C. H. Thomason, J. T. Hutchins, A. F. Meneger, L. Ferguson, O. M. Veride, E. H. Menger, F. Feler, Mack Missik, A. Heckes, B. Felder, C. W. Morgan, E. Heckes, A. K. Gore, R. R. Fratt, F. L. Riley, Mose C. Cauthern, J. B. Newell, Fred Kathberger, L. N. Jones, J. H. Hogan, C. E. Mitchell, W. E. Groom, G. V. Clayton, F. Shelton, L. S. O'Neal, Chas. E. Thomas, T. W. Martman, S. J. Redman, W. D. Bryars, T. H. Plumb, W. E. Sarren, H. C. Raedal, Chas. F. Prince, G. A. McGee, Alamogordo Commercial Club.

SILVER CITY, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Please exert your best efforts to have the oil and gas leasing bill which is about to be introduced amended so that its provision will not affect any present oil location upon which discovery has not yet been made in this State, as you know there are a number of oil locations already made upon which discoveries have not yet been made and which undoubtedly will be developed. If bill passes in present form believe it will seriously affect oil development in this State.

F. W. VELLACOTT.
T. L. LOWE.
W. C. PORTERFIELD.
E. M. SAWYER.

From the Deming Chamber of Commerce:

DEMING, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Use your best influence to have section 36 of mining laws amended; of vital importance to this section.

DEMING CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.
J. A. MAHONEY, President.

Here is one from Hurley, N. Mex., signed by several prominent citizens of that section:

HURLEY, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence against that portion oil and land bill which might have a tendency to invalidate present locations upon which no discoveries have been made.

HURLEY LAND AND LEASE ASSOCIATION.
By F. E. MORTON and H. S. BOISE.

A telegram from Roswell, N. Mex., reads as follows:

ROSWELL, N. MEX., August 30, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Great injustice will be done the present locators of placer claims in New Mexico who are working in good faith for development if their prior rights as locators under the present law is not recognized under the new oil-leasing law now before Congress. It will throw the bars down to an army of outsiders, oil sharks, who will crowd out the present locators by fair means or foul and cause no end of serious trouble and gun play. Please mail at once copy of the oil-leasing bill.

ROSWELL OIL DEVELOPMENT CO.

Another from Silver City, from the American National Bank:

SILVER CITY, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence against that portion of oil and gas leasing bill which might operate to invalidate present locations upon which discoveries have not yet been made.

AMERICAN NATIONAL BANK.

Another from Albuquerque, from a very prominent attorney there:

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Hope oil-leasing bill protects present valid locations.

W. C. REID.

One from Socorro, N. Mex., signed by H. O. Busom, George Curry, C. T. Brown, and probably 50 others, most of whom I know personally, and know that they are responsible citizens of that community:

SOCORRO, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

About 500 locators of oil land in Socorro County want change in provision of leasing bill. All location in New Mexico will be void for want of discovery. Section 36 should be amended so as to protect claims located in present year regardless whether discovery has yet been made.

H. O. Busom, Geo. Curry, C. T. Brown, Matt Fowler, M. C. Mechem, Geo. Sickless, Geo. E. Cook, W. B. Bunton, Lee Baldwin, Fred Baldwin, Powell Stickhouse, jr., B. H. Kinney, J. S. McTavish, C. L. Tallmage, G. E. Senohoze, C. G. Duncan, W. A. Parvis, J. M. Sully, Geo. Keith, C. N. Hilton, S. P. Owens, T. J. Ross, W. J. Eaton, J. E. Tores, C. E. Moffett, Julies Camprede, Fred Nichols, H. G. Sanderson, Robt. Law, John McIntyre, B. A. Pino, A. C. Tores, Malton Tores.

One from Tularosa, N. Mex., from an ex-judge of the State:

TULAROSA, N. MEX., August 28, 1919.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Citizens of New Mexico relying upon present laws have expended, and are about to expend, large sums on oil development especially in Tularosa Basin, which oil-leasing law will affect. They consider they now have vested right and prolonged litigation may develop and retard progress until settled. Suggest law should be amended so as not to affect present rights acquired in good faith.

E. L. MEDLER.

One from Las Cruces, N. Mex.:

LAS CRUCES, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Provisions of oil-leasing bill in Senate considered inimical to interests of oil locators in New Mexico. If bill passes in present shape oil locations void, want prior discovery. Can not section 36 be amended to protect claims located present year? Can it be amended in conformity to New Mexico statute regulating discovery-placer locations?

W. W. COX.
H. B. HOLT.

Another from Las Cruces:

LAS CRUCES, N. MEX., August 28, 1919.

Hon. A. A. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Locations of Cox Oil Co. made in good faith this year, thousands expended preparatory to drilling for oil; pending bill should make adequate provision for protection of bona fide explorers initiating rights before its passage; see wire of Wednesday. Kindly wire present status and prospects.

COX-HOLT.

In that connection I will state that in the spring of this year Mr. Cox, who is quite a prominent citizen of that State, a banker and cattleman and prominent generally in business circles, organized a company for the purpose of exploring a section of the country with the expectation of finding oil. He advertised his plan throughout the State. He was perfectly frank about it. He let everybody understand that what money they put into it was simply put in for the purpose of prospecting, for the purpose of drilling a well; that they might get something, and they might not; and he advised all people not to put in any money which they could not afford to lose; but, of course, nobody wants to lose if it can be avoided. In response to that call the citizens of New Mexico generally subscribed to his stock, and he raised in that way, I think, $150,000. That money is on hand, and a portion of it has been used in the purchase of machinery and other preparations for drilling. He made locations upon the public domain this year, as I recall, along about March and April of this year. Of course, there has been no discovery of oil up to date, and can not be this year unless a very unusual condition should be found.

There are other telegrams here from other people—one from the State land commissioner, which says:

SANTA FE, N. MEX., August 27, 1919.

Senator ANDRIEUS A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.:

Section 36 oil-leasing bill should be amended to protect claim located present year regardless of discovery.

N. A. FIELD, Commissioner.

These telegrams are coming in right along.

Now, Mr. President, I want to submit the case to the Senate so that Senators may see whether or not the fears of these people are justified; and if they are justified I feel certain that proper relief will be granted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that in such a case as cited by him in his remarks I have not any doubt but that they are taken care of under section 36 of the bill. It is short, and I desire to read it at this time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be very glad to have the Senator state his views upon that section at this time.

Mr. SMOOT (reading)—

That the deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, and gas, herein referred to, in lands valuable for such minerals shall be subject to disposition only in the form and manner provided in this act, except as to valid claims existent at date of the passage of this act and thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws.

I wish to say to the Senator that the bills that have been heretofore introduced used the language "except as to valid locations" and that has been changed to "valid claims." That was done as the result of the decision of the United States circuit court, in which the court upheld the Western American Oil Co. in the claims that they had which were contested by the Government of the United States. I am quite sure that under section 36 of the pending bill if the parties referred to by the Senator have complied with the law and have made their locations under existing law and continued to comply with the law, so that up to date they have valid claims, they will not be interfered with in any way.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Utah has made that statement. I think it is due to the committee that the statement should have been made. I will add at this point that it is my understanding that the same construction has been put upon the section by other Senators who are members of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if he has before him the decision of the circuit court of appeals in the case of the Consolidated Oil Co. against the United States, where this matter was gone into fully and decided in favor of the construction given by the committee and by the chairman? I have that decision before me, if the Senator has it not.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have hunted for that decision, but have been unable to find it, and I should be very glad if the Senator from Wisconsin will make a statement regarding it at this time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as the Senator will remember in the withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, President Taft made an exception to the withdrawal in these words:

All locations or claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigations and examination.

The Department of Justice, and I think also the Department of the Interior—the Senator was Assistant Secretary of the Interior at that time—had held that the words "locations or claims" necessarily meant completed discovery, and that was really the reason why the Pickett Act was passed, because it was feared that under the exception to the Taft withdrawal men who had complied with the law in all respects up to the time of withdrawal and had thereafter prosecuted their claims with due diligence would not be protected. That, I repeat, was really the reason for the passage of the Pickett Act.

I wish to say that at all times I took the position that the exception in the Taft withdrawal order fully protected every bona fide claimant and permitted him to proceed upon the withdrawn lands if he proceeded with due diligence to discovery and was entitled to a patent. The matter finally came before the courts in the case of the United States against Consolidated Mutual Oil Co., and the circuit court of appeals rendered the decision from which I now quote, as follows:

It is insisted on behalf of the Government that the exemptions from the effect of the order of the President therein provided for can not be properly held to apply to any land upon which at the time of its promulgation no mineral had been discovered, even though, as in the present cases, the land had been located under and by virtue of the mining laws, its boundaries properly marked on the ground, and the assignees of the locators then in its bona fide actual possession actively engaged in seeking mineral therein.

A discovery of mineral in the ground under such conditions would manifestly have perfected the locations not only against third parties but also against the Government, and would have given to the owner of them an equitable title against the United States, and have entitled the owner to the legal title, upon compliance with the statutory requirements respecting annual assessment work and payments, which rights would have been secure under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. Such locations upon which discovery had then been made needed no protection through any order of the President.

President Taft, who had himself been a distinguished Federal judge, of course, well knew this, and we think it altogether unreasonable to hold that the words employed by him in his order, "all locations and claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigations and examination," were intended or can be fairly construed to apply to lands upon which discovery had already been made and to which its locators had already acquired an equitable title; but, on the contrary, that they were intended and should be held to apply to all locations and claims existing at the time of the making of the "withdrawal order," to which the locators or claimants had some valid rights.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. Will the pending bill, should it become a law, have the effect to permit people who have already begun the location of a claim to extend their right to 2,560 acres?

Mr. LENROOT. It will not if they have proceeded under the placer-mining law.

Mr. KIRBY. What I mean to ask is, if they have not completed location under the old law, but have already made claims or locations in fact, will the bill have the effect of extending their right to 2,560 acres of land?

Mr. LENROOT. Extend their right in what respect?

Mr. KIRBY. Their right to locate or to develop under the proposed new law?

Mr. LENROOT. No. Under section 19 of this proposed law if a locator was bona fide upon the land at the time of any withdrawal or if he was upon the land under like circumstances on January 1, 1919, he will be given a preference right for a prospecting permit for all the land upon which he has located and nothing more.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to conclude upon this other matter.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well.

Mr. LENROOT. The committee in section 36 have used identically the language of President Taft in his withdrawal order, except the word "locations." So if it were possible they have made stronger and more certain the protection of any bona fide claimant under existing mining laws at the date of the passage of this act, so that he may proceed if he will comply with the placer mining to discovery and to full title, irrespective of the provisions of this proposed act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. ASHURST. I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin to put into the RECORD the entire opinion which he has just read.

Mr. LENROOT. I have only the excerpt just read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in this connection, if the Senator desires to do so, I suggest to him to call to the attention of the parties interested, and those who have sent the telegrams which he has read into the RECORD, the decision in favor of the North American Oil Co. which was sustained by the United States district court of appeals covering the same question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have the decision rendered by the district court of California in the case of the North American Oil Co., but I have been unable to find any decision in that case by the circuit court of appeals. I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin the date of the decision to which he has referred.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not the date on this memorandum, but it was about a year ago. I should like to say further that since that time, to my personal knowledge, the Department of Justice has accepted this construction, and I understand the Secretary of the Interior has done likewise.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I hope the decisions to which attention has just been called by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wisconsin will be accepted without question by all of the courts of the country. I have been aware of the previous rulings by the Department of the Interior, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin. I feel convinced, however, that the decision of the circuit court of appeals, from which the Senator from Wisconsin has just read, ought to be the law, because the use of the word "claims," to the ordinary mind at any rate, would include anything which had been obtained or any act done under lawful authority. I believe that that should be sufficient; but here are these telegrams expressing all of these fears, and, of course, these people are very much interested in this subject. They want this matter put beyond any possible construction against them. They want to go ahead in the way they thought they had a right to do in the absence of any future legislation.

I desire to make this suggestion to the chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee, that, with this intend to mind, we can do no harm, and certainly will remove fears on the part of these people, if after the word "claims," in the first line on page 33, we insert the words "or possessions," so that it will read: "except as to valid claims or possessions."

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator we can not accept such an amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly not.

Mr. SMOOT. That would mean that a man could go on the land, take any number of acres, and be in possession of them——

Mr. LENROOT. He might have a lease for grazing lands and be in possession of them.

Mr. SMOOT. As the Senator from Wisconsin suggests, he might have a lease on grazing land and be in possession of that land. The proposed amendment is too broad; we could not accept it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I will make it read "and possessions under the mining law."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I sincerely hope, in view of the decisions of the courts, that the Senator will not press any amendment which will again throw the construction in doubt and into the courts.

Mr. SMOOT. If we accept an amendment of that character, then the whole question will have to be thrashed out again; it will have to be taken from one court to another, and it will be years before the question is settled. The question as to the wording of this section has been settled now, and I feel sure, I repeat to the Senator, that the parties in whom he is interested will be taken care of under section 36.

I received to-day a letter from the president of the Holbrook (Ariz.) Oil Bureau and Mining District, of Holbrook, Ariz. Mr. Sapp, the president of the company, certainly has not read this bill or he never would have written such a letter. What I am afraid of is that they have not received copies of the bill as reported. They must have received some copy other than the bill we have before the Senate.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I know Mr. Sapp very well. What is the date, please, of the letter?

Mr. SMOOT. This is dated August 25.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. Sapp, I suppose, had not received at that time my letter transmitting a copy of the bill. He is an excellent lawyer, and has been superior judge of his county, and when he wrote the letter, I suppose, he did not have a copy of the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and from the letter I judged that Judge Sapp is entirely against any leasing system.

Mr. ASHURST. No doubt he is.

Mr. SMOOT. And I think that is the basis of the whole complaint.

Mr. ASHURST. I am sure Judge Sapp reflects the sentiment of the local community there.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. ASHURST. Will the Senator from New Mexico pardon me a moment?

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me?

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to interject a statement while the matter is timely and before it gets away from me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield first to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, with much respect for the opinion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who has given this matter careful and intelligent consideration, and with respect for the opinion held by the Senator from Wisconsin

[Mr. LENROOT], I share the view entertained by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. Now, I ask the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to remember that in the withdrawal order of President Taft the President used the words "location" and "claim." This bill, as the Senator from New Mexico points out, says "claim." We examined the statute the other evening, and we find that in the original mining law of 1872 the words "location" and "claim," claim of location, are used interchangeably and synonymously; and although I have respect for the opinions of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wisconsin, I think nevertheless there is great force in the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico when we reflect that the statute itself uses the terms "claim" and "location" interchangeably and synonymously, and that President Taft's withdrawal order uses the words "location" and "claim." I do think, with the Senator from New Mexico, that the words "location and claim" should be inserted.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection whatsoever.

Mr. LENROOT. It was only in the nature of removing any possibility of a doubt, a discovery in the past having always been connected with the word "location," that we omitted the word "location"; but if the Senator desires the word "location" I have no objection.

Mr. ASHURST. But the statute uses the term "location." Then in another line it uses the word "claim." It uses the words interchangeably.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to the identical words in President Taft's order.

Mr. ASHURST. I assure the Senator that that is the language.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the language, because it says "all locations or claims existing."

Mr. ASHURST. That is all right.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I first have to yield to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. Then I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to call attention to another decision; that is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, my colleague called attention to a communication received by him from Judge Sidney Sapp, the president of the Holbrook (Ariz.) Oil Bureau and Mining District. I received a communication from him under date of August 25, and I think the whole tenor of his letter is that he is opposed to the leasing system. He states as to the bill before the Senate now:

> Vast areas of Arizona are still open to mineral discovery, and the prospector, as in the past, is the hope of the State, and his efforts will, as also in the past, redound to the benefit not of a few capitalists but of the people at large.

Then he further states, referring to the leasing bill:

> The passage will throttle development in this State, where 67 per cent of all the taxes are derived from mineral development, and, at best, would place the resources of Arizona at the mercies of monopolies—in all likelihood of foreign ones at that. There is no valid reason why the public domain of the United States should be placed out of reach of the average citizen or why provisions which have served the country well in the past should be altered. The Holbrook (Ariz.) Oil Bureau and Mining District represents approximately 600,000 acres of located land, whereon development for oil has been inaugurated in absolute good faith and excellent prospects for successful exploration. Protest with all of the emphasis possible against the passage of the present bill.

I want to say, if my colleague will permit me, that one view expressed by Judge Sapp I do not quite concur in, namely, that the pending measure would make for monopolistic control of the mineral lands of the United States. I am opposed to the leasing system. I am opposed to this measure, but not for the reason indicated in that part of the sentence of Judge Sapp's letter to which I called attention.

In view of the observations made by the Senator from Arizona, I felt that I ought to present this letter before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the letter I have received is similar to the one my colleague has received. I think Judge Sapp ought to know that if his policy were carried out the locators of oil lands that have been entered in Arizona under existing law would never receive title to them. The President would withdraw those lands before ever title was passed to the locator, just the same as the President, through the department, has done with all such lands in the past. What we are doing in this bill is to pass legislation that will allow the development of those lands, not in the way I would want them developed, nor the way the Senator from Arizona would want them developed, but in the only way we have at our command to see that they are developed, and that is through a leasing system.

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me just for a further observation, I purpose sending Judge Sapp a copy of the RECORD of to-day's proceedings, and he will be able to see what the views of Senators are. Speaking for myself, I was about to say those from the West, but certainly those of us who are opposed to a leasing bill, realize at last that the only way a private individual, especially a man of limited means, will ever get a pound of coal out of the earth or a gallon of oil out of the public domain will be under a leasing bill, because the departments, acting under the direction of the executive arm of the Government, have overthrown the old mining law, and we are facing the practical situation of passing some leasing bill or allowing the Standard Oil Co. to run riot in the oil market. We have no choice in the matter. The executive arm by its withdrawal, and the courts by their view of the law supporting those executive withdrawals, have forever put it beyond the reach of the man of modest means to secure title to or possession of a coal claim or an oil claim on the public domain. I regret that those withdrawals should have been made, but they have been made and the courts have sustained them. So we are powerless, and the coal and oil of the public domain are out of the reach of poor men unless it be by a leasing system.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I promised to yield to the Senator from Colorado, if he now desires me to do so.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think perhaps what I intended to say is not of any particular consequence. My recollection is that in the case of the Del Monte Mining Co. against another mining company whose name escapes me, the Supreme Court of the United States defined the word "location" and the word "claim" as they occur in that part of the mining law relating to lode locations as the equivalent of each other, and I am inclined to think that such has been the uniform drift of decisions where the question was involved; and by analogy I presume the same doctrine would apply to a placer location. If that is correct, then the use of either or of both terms would be sufficient to cover the apprehension which the Senator's constituents have outlined in the telegrams that have just been read into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad the Senator has called attention to the decision in the Del Monte Mining Co. case. That decision is to be found in One hundred and seventy-first United States Reports, page 74, and does lay down specifically the doctrine which the Senator from Colorado has just announced, that the words "claim" and "location" are used interchangeably, as also stated by the Senator from Arizona. This is what my constituents undoubtedly have in mind. Everybody knows that there is no valid location until after there is discovery, and that is the cause of the apprehension of my constituents.

In view of the statements of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wisconsin, leading members of the majority of the committee, that they want to protect these people, I submit that there can be no reason why we should not put in here language which will protect them beyond any peradventure. The decision of the circuit court of appeals to which the Senator has referred, I hope, is the law. It ought to be the law, because by the use of the word "claims" here and in the withdrawal order of President Taft I have not the slightest doubt but that it was the intention to protect every bona fide occupant of the public domain who had gone there in pursuance of the laws of the country, seeking to develop the resources of the country. These apprehensions, however, exist. The decision to which the Senator from Wisconsin referred is not the decision of a court of last resort in this country. It is only the decision of the circuit court of appeals. For all I know, that decision may be now on appeal to the Supreme Court. A decision to the contrary may come from some other circuit court and reach the Supreme Court of the United States. But while we all have our minds upon doing the thing, I see no reason in the world why we should have to rely upon the decision of a circuit court of appeals, when we can by the use of language make it perfectly plain and remove all doubt that may be in the mind of anyone; and if we insert, after the word "claims," the words "or possessions under the mining laws," then this exception would read:

> Except as to valid claims or possessions under the mining laws existent at date of the passage of this act and thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, will the Senator yield, Mr. President?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to state to the Senator my objection to that amendment. Under the amendment of the Senator, if a man a year ago made a location in the sense of marking out his boundaries and recording them, and remained in possession but had done nothing looking toward discovery, the Senator's amendment would protect that locator, and that locator ought not to be protected. Under the language as it stands, in order to receive the protection of section 36 there must have been a location, and up to the time of the passage of this act the locator must have been diligently in pursuit of discovery. He may not have made discovery, but he must have complied with the mining laws up to the date of the passage of this act. If he has not so complied, he is not entitled to the exception.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I feel quite sure that the Senator from Wisconsin has not realized as yet the full force of the language which I propose inserting. It would make the exception to the act apply only to valid claims or possessions under the mining laws, and the amendment which I put in would only mean valid possession under the mining laws. I do not believe the case which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred to would come under this provision, because it must be a valid possession under the mining laws.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if it is possible to have a valid claim and not be in possession of the land so located that ripens into that claim?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is undoubtedly right, that possession is only one of the elements of a valid claim; but the word "claim," under the decision which has been referred to by the Senator from Colorado in this Del Monte case, is used interchangeably with the word "location," as the Senator from Utah knows.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not want to put the word "location" in here, does he?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not, because the Senator from Utah knows that the word "location" has a very definite meaning under the mining laws, and that that presupposes a discovery.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that. The Senator is perfectly correct. That is what I said before, and therefore I think it would be very unwise for us to put in here "location or claim"; but it does seem to me that if we put in there "or possessions under the mining laws" it would result in making it possible for anyone, for instance, that may make a location between the passage of this bill in the Senate and the signing of the bill by the President of the United States, if it passes the House, to locate any land wherever he wanted to and in any quantity, under the law, and then be in possession of that and then fall under section 36.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Utah having stated already that the purpose of the bill as framed would protect anybody who did enter into possession of the public domain under the mining laws up to the time of the passage of the act——

Mr. LENROOT. And had complied with the law up to that time.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he has a valid claim, and that is all he has.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. He has no valid possession unless he has complied with the law necessary to make that possession valid.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not believe the Senator could find in any statute that has been passed by Congress since the first mining law was passed where the words "in possession under the mining law" are used, and I feel sure if those words are included in the bill it will lead to any amount of litigation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator really wants to cover the situation and wants to get a word which has been used in the statute, I call his attention to the Pickett Act of 1912, where it says "bona fide occupant." I am willing to use the word "occupant," if the Senator prefers it, so that it will read:

Any valid claim or occupation under the mining law.

If the Senator will yield, I have no doubt, and I do not think the Senator has any doubt, that in view of the decision of the court of appeals, the view of the Department of Justice, the view of the Department of the Interior since that time, used in this connection, a "valid claim" means a claim that up to the time of the passage of this act has been asserted under the mining law, so that if continued to discovery it would entitle the claimant to a patent. If the Senator proposes to use that word and in addition "a bona fide occupant," it must mean that and something else.

I want to say to the Senator very frankly that for years on all such bills, and this has been one of the most troublesome questions, no one has been unwilling to protect a bona fide claimant who has complied with the law in all respects up to the time of withdrawal in a proceeding with which to get a patent, but we have endeavored not to give protection to anybody else, and if we are going to open the door now by any such language as the Senator proposes I wish to say very frankly that instead of being an advocate of the bill, as I have been from the start, I shall oppose it.

I must confess my inability to get that point of view. The Senator from Wisconsin is perfectly willing to protect the rights of anyone who is on the public domain in pursuance of the placer mining laws and who has not yet made a discovery. It has been decided time and again that the word "location" presupposes a discovery. It has been decided by the United States Supreme Court that the words "location" and "claim" as used in the mining laws are interchangeable. In the withdrawal by President Taft the language "location and claim" was used.

I have not read the full opinion of the circuit court of appeals, but I can see how, by the use of the two words, the court might have concluded that by the use of the word "claim," together with the word "location," something in addition to location was intended. But that decision is not the decision of the court of last resort in this country. I believe the decision is good law, or it ought to be good law, but I have learned in my career that it is very difficult to know absolutely what the court of last resort is going to say is the law. The Supreme Court of the United States may say that that is the law; and in view of other decisions and the former practice of the Department of the Interior, I can see how the Supreme Court might decide otherwise.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. With pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. In the Taft withdrawal, if the Supreme Court decided otherwise it would have to regard the exception as having no meaning whatever. In the present case for the court or the department to give such a construction to section 36 as the Senator thinks might be given to it, would mean that section 36 has no meaning whatever in the law. There would be no possible use in attempting to protect a completed discovery, because such a discovery needs no protection in the law; we could give it no protection. Therefore the only possible construction that can be given to it is the construction given by the circuit court of appeals in the Consolidated Mutual case. And if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the Senator's amendment, consider this kind of a case: A locator went upon land six months ago in good faith and proceeded for three months in good faith. He still is in good faith, but has not the money to develop and go further, and work has been suspended upon that location for three months. He is still in possession; it has not been withdrawn; no one else has asserted possession. The Senator's amendment would permit that man, when he had no valid claim because of the suspension of work, to begin work and proceed to patent. That is not the theory of the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not sure that I caught all the Senator said, but clearly under the language which I employ there must be a valid possession under the mining law in order that anyone may get any protection under the amendment which I propose. The Senator states that the language does not mean anything if it is not intended to protect those who have not made a discovery. I will say to the Senator that that view I happen to know is not agreed to by at least one of the very able lawyers in this body. The view has been suggested to me that not only does the language not include claims preceding discovery but that it was intended to include only the claims after discovery, and that the exception was put in for the purpose of enabling parties to go ahead and obtain a patent after the discovery had been made.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator knows very well that no patent is needed to secure to the discoverer a vested right. It certainly could not have meant that. The circuit court of appeals has said directly the contrary, and I am sure it must appeal to every lawyer that President Taft was not merely in the exception seeking to protect the paper title by a patent when the discoverer had a full equitable title and could exhaust every barrel of oil from the well without ever going again to the United States Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I suppose it will be impossible to convince the Senator from Wisconsin that there is any necessity for this amendment, but I must confess my inability to see how any objection can arise to the amendment if Senators want to accomplish just the thing which the Senator from Wisconsin says he wants to accomplish.

Senators can not conceive of anything in the amendment proposed which is not necessary to a valid claim under the existing mining law, and if that be so why not accept this language and put it beyond all doubt? Why leave it open to construction? Why invite litigation?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I feel tempted to make a suggestion in this connection. The Senator will recall that section of the mining law which authorizes the issuance of a patent to one who has occupied mining land for a period equal to the local statute of limitations, even though he never makes a location at all. In other words, the statute gives essentially full title to one whose title simply ripens from possession. The word "possession" as used there would embrace, as I take it, something more than the Senator has in mind to take care of, his purpose, as I understand it, being to take care only of those who have actually made a location—that is, marked it out upon the ground as provided by local statute and filed the certificate of location. The other is too vague and obscure a right to undertake to fix here.

As the Senator will recall, he spoke to me about it, and I expressed some considerable doubt as to whether the words "valid claim" used here would not imply that discovery had been made. Indeed, it was my impression in the first place, and I am not sure that it is entirely removed, that that is a proper construction to give it. My view about the matter was very much disturbed when the Senator called my attention to the later provision of the section to this effect:

> And thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws.

That would seem to imply that the location was not, as we expressed it, entirely perfect at the time to which the bill refers. But I submit to the Senator that now that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, has expressed his understanding of it, and his view about the matter is supported by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], there can be no doubt as to what was the intent of the Senate at least in using this language, and that it was the purpose of the Senate to take care of just such cases as the Senator from New Mexico has in mind, namely, the case of one who has marked out his location upon the ground and complied in all respects with the State statute entitling him to possession of the ground within the limits of the location.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from New Mexico will yield a moment, may I say that this language has been agreed upon by the Interior Department, and that they have given the same construction I have urged. So there is no possible question as to the construction of the Interior Department as to the language.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state that I had two purposes in view in presenting this matter to the Senate in the way I have done. The first was to get in the bill language which in the mind of anyone would put the case beyond all question; and failing that, to get an expression from the chairman of the committee and various Senators in the body as to the construction for the purpose of getting the effect to which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has referred. I think myself that in view of the expressions which have been made here to-day the Interior Department would not be warranted in turning down any person who had made a location in pursuance of the mining laws prior to the passage of this act, and that he would have a right to go ahead and perfect the claim by complying with the laws.

But I must confess that even yet I am not convinced that we ought not to put in some language here. The reference of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the provision of the statute which gives possession for the time covered by the statute of limitations in the State gives, as the Senator has stated, a right to a patent; but if he was in possession of a mining claim under the law of the United States, why should he not then be protected?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I answered the Senator that it was because, as it seems to me, it is too obscure. That man has not even filed a notice of location. That man perhaps has not even complied with the statute in relation to marking the corners. He has not done anything, except that he is in possession of it, and he is in possession of it for the period of the statute of limitations. But it would give him a right to patent. So I referred to it for the purpose of indicating to the Senator that if the words "valid possession" were put in it would go beyond the case that he desires to take care of.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that that is followed by other words, as the amendment reads, "or possession under the mining law." As I take it, while the possession under the statute of limitations may ripen into a title, it is not possession in pursuance of or under any mining law.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not agree with that, because his only right to patent as a matter of course is derived under the mining law, and his possession, of course, must be under the mining law in anticipation of eventually securing a patent from the Government before the statute of limitations shall run.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, to meet the objection of the Senator from Montana, assuming it to be well founded—and I must say that his expression of opinion carries great weight, so far as I am concerned, in the consideration of any legal proposition—we can put in here to cover that point, if the Senator thinks it advisable, the word "placer," so that it will read "or possession under the placer-mining law of the United States."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would not change the situation a bit, because this is a common statute, and it says anyone having occupied a mining claim for the period of the statute of limitations shall be entitled to patent, having worked it, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from New Mexico that I think the wording of the provision is exactly as it ought to be, and if we put in any other words the locator is going to have trouble; it is going to be carried to the courts, and there will be no telling what the decision will be. I believe it is for the best interest of the men who are trying to develop the oil fields of the West, the men to whom the Senator has referred, to rely upon this provision of the bill just as it is. I hope the Senator will not be too insistent upon a vote of the Senate upon his amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think I have succeeded in accomplishing one purpose. If these people suffer any injury, they are going to put the blame upon the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if they do sustain any injury whatever the Senator from Utah will be one Senator who will help the Senator from New Mexico to pass a remedial act as quickly as possible to take care of those men.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, with that assurance I will abandon the amendment. I accept the construction of the Senator from Utah, the Senator from Wisconsin, and the Senator from Montana. I feel, of course, that I have put my constituents in very good hands, with the promise of the Senator from Utah that if they get into trouble he will give them remedial legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I can.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I have not yet yielded the floor. There is another amendment which I have to present.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment, because I must leave the Chamber?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, two days ago in discussing this bill I made some strictures upon former Special Assistant Attorney General Kearful, who writes me a somewhat passionate letter of protest, some features of which are decidedly personal. But I always make allowance for a man who writes or speaks in the heat of passion and prompted by a sense of injury. Mr. Kearful challenges the correctness of some of my statements and says in effect that his only remedy is to call the matter to my attention and insist that what he says upon the subject shall be inserted in the RECORD, since my privilege as a Member of this body is my protection and his inability to otherwise defend himself.

I have never insisted and never shall insist upon the shield of senatorial privilege, Mr. President, nor shall I knowingly abuse it. I have always, therefore, inserted in the RECORD anything that is printable which is sent to me by anyone who feels that I have upon this floor either misrepresented or traduced him. A man who would take advantage of his official position to intentionally or deliberately do either and then fall back upon his privilege does not deserve a seat in the Senate of the United States. I therefore ask that Mr. Kearful be given his day in court by inserting the letter which he has sent me in the RECORD just as I received it, without the change of a word or syllable. And if the extract he makes from my speech is unfounded I shall, of course, retract it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, the letter will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, August 30, 1919.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the Senate on day before yesterday, while S. 2775, known as the oil-leasing bill, was under consideration, you made the following statement (CONG. REC., p. 4449):

"The Attorney General even permitted one of his satellites, an Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the House committee publicly to impugn the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior and his subordinates by declaring that their opposition to certain sections of that bill was due to the fact that they felt that under its administration by the Interior Department all fraudulent locations and locators of oil claims would be protected and recognized, and by failing to repudiate him the honorable Attorney General acquiesced in that statement, thus placing an imputation upon the official character and good name of one of the most conscientious, upright, and capable Secretaries of the Interior this country ever had; and up to the good hour of Attorney General Gregory's resignation the Department of Justice gave no sign that the man who recorded that infamous slander was not authoried to do so. The present Attorney General has given that gentleman his congé and appointed to succeed him a man who is incapable of such conduct either in office or out of it. That is the sort of treatment this much-needed legislation has received and is receiving."

I am the person to whom you referred as "an Assistant Attorney General of the United States," guilty of an "infamous slander" against the Secretary of the Interior, in which former Attorney General Gregory acquiesced. There is no truth in any part of the statement; but that which most concerns me is your assertion that, because of the aforesaid misconduct of the Assistant Attorney General, "the present Attorney General has given that gentleman his congé."

If I knew a more expressive foreign word to disguise the short and ugly English one which properly characterizes that assertion I should want to use it here. In your own elegant and parliamentary English it was at least an "infamous slander." It was more than infamous; it was pusillanimous. When you stated to the Senate as a fact that I had been unceremoniously discharged by Attorney General Palmer for misconduct in the office of Assistant Attorney General, you stated, under the protection of senatorial immunity, what you must have known to be unqualifiedly false if you knew anything at all about the fact.

You spoke as if by authority of "the present Attorney General," and those who heard you speak and others who read the RECORD must so understand it, for he is the one and only person whose statement regarding the fact could be authoritative. You did not ask him about it, but evidently accepted as true a miserable rumor from some malignant source. Had you made inquiry of Attorney General Palmer he would have told you, and he will tell you now if you are interested in making a just retraction, that my resignation was wholly voluntary and for private business reasons; that I remained in office at his earnest solicitation for several months; and that after the appointment of my successor I remained for two more months as a special assistant to continue the conduct of these very oil matters of which you complain so much, until my successor could become acquainted with the subject.

You have asserted in the Senate heretofore, on two other occasions and equally without justification, that I slandered the Secretary of the Interior in this same particular. That was a year ago. (See 56 CONG. REC., pt. 10, p. 10486; pt. 11, p. 10568.) As to that you are not the judge; he had then, and has now, his remedy. Indeed, for a year and a half he has had a choice of remedies. But for the false and unjust record you have made against me I am without a remedy unless it pleases you to afford it. What you recorded to my lasting discredit—contrary to the fact—was spoken on the floor of the Senate, and, as you have probably forgotten, can not lawfully be questioned in any other place. Are you willing to let that record stand?

I am jealous of my record in the Department of Justice. If you would learn something about it, ask any justice of the Supreme Court, before whom I presented some thirty-odd cases of importance during the past three years; ask any of the men who have been my associates in the department; since you would discredit Mr. Gregory also, ask former Solicitor General Davis or the present Solicitor General; ask any of my adversaries in the Government litigation, among whom are some prominent lawyers in your own home town; if you would have the highest authority on the subject about which you assume in ignorance to speak, ask the President—he knows.

Inasmuch as your discreditable statement in the Senate can not be corrected elsewhere, I must insist that it be corrected there in the terms of this letter.

Very sincerely, yours.

FRANCIS J. KEARFUL,
Special Assistant Attorney General.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I now desire to call attention to another matter which does affect some of my constituents. In seeking some remedy for the evil of which they complain, and assuming the worst, that their locations would not be protected under section 36, I started to find some other way of meeting this situation which would not be to their real financial embarrassment. In considering the matter it occurred to me that whether section 36 means what we have now decided it does mean or not, those people are still entitled to a better provision in the bill regarding the leasing feature than is now provided for in it. What I have to say about people in New Mexico undoubtedly applies to locators in various other Western States.

Under section 19 of this bill any person who prior to the 1st of January of this year has made a location, or, to use the language of the bill—that any person who, at the time of any withdrawal order, or who on January 1, 1919, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry—

By the way, I will call the attention of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to that language. If the language which I proposed a while ago as an amendment to section 36 would be improper or unwise, then the use of the word "occupant," used on page 18, section 19, should be subject to the same criticism. The language is:

SEC. 19. That any person who, at the time of any withdrawal order, or who on January 1, 1919, was a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas lands not withdrawn from entry, and who had previously performed all acts under then existing laws necessary to valid locations thereof except to make discovery, and upon which discovery had not been made prior to the passage of this act, and who had performed work or expended on or for the benefit of such locations an amount equal in the aggregate of $250 for each location if application therefor shall be made within six months from the passage of this act shall be entitled to prospecting permits thereon upon the same terms and conditions as other permits provided for in this act——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the language referred to is not subject to the criticism voiced by the Senator. I think that language is intended to take care of this situation: In a number of the States—and apparently that is the case in the State of New Mexico—the law provides for marking an oil placer location upon the ground and for filing the notice of location. In the State of Wyoming the law provides for a subsequent notice to be filed whenever discovery has been made, and then the two notices complete and perfect the title of the locator.

But in my State there is no such provision. There is the ordinary location certificate notice that recites that a discovery has been made; and no one can make it, without committing perjury, unless he has already made discovery. So there is in my State no provision whatever by which a man can go out upon the public domain and mark an area which he would subsequently claim as his placer claim. He has got to go and conduct his operations upon the ground. He has no claim; he is simply an occupant of the public domain engaged in drilling operations. It was to take care of such cases as that, I think, that the word "occupant" was used as applicable to a man conducting drilling operations in my State as distinguished from a claimant, a man conducting operations, in the State of the Senator from New Mexico.

If the Senator will pardon me, I have before me the statute to which I called his attention a moment ago, and, with his permission, I will ask to read a portion of it. It is section 2332 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows:

Where such person or association, they and their grantors—

That is, the parties applying for patent—have held and worked their claims for a period equal to the time prescribed by the statute of limitations for mining claims of the State or Territory where the same may be situated, evidence of such possession and working of the claims for such period shall be sufficient to establish a right to a patent thereto under this chapter, in the absence of any adverse claim.

So the Senator will observe that it is not even necessary to have a notice on record or anything else. All the locator has to prove is that he has been in possession of the claim for the period of the statute of limitations.

I refer to this for the purpose of showing that the possession of mining ground is recognized in the mining act as a foundation for a right to a patent just as well as is a location perfected in accordance with the laws of the local jurisdiction.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am sure this discussion is enlightening, but——

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. There is a further reason in addition to that suggested by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] for this provision. It relates, I think, wholly to the State of Wyoming. In the case of a great many claims there persons have made what they claim to be a discovery of oil, but the Department of the Interior, as the Senator well knows, has held in many such cases that it was not a sufficient discovery because not in commercial quantities. The locators have acted in good faith; they are in possession; but nothing has been done since the drilling of what is called the "validity well" except to keep up the assessment work. The purpose of this provision was, in part, so long as we are going to give prospecting permits, to give the preference to such an occupant, who had actually expended as much as $250 upon the claim although he might not have any valid claim, because in law there was not a sufficient discovery and nothing had been done for a considerable period of time prior to the passage of this bill that would enable him to maintain it as a valid claim.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Since we have adverted to the other provisions, I want to state to the Senator that there has just been handed me this suggestion with regard to section 36, that at the end of the section we add the words "by discovery or otherwise." I believe that this suggestion coming at this time will be accepted by everybody. It can not affect any point which any Senator has suggested.

Mr. LENROOT. There is only one way to perfect a claim and that is by discovery. You can not, therefore, say "otherwise."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Why can we not say so?

Mr. SMOOT. A claim can only be perfected by discovery. The suggestion is to insert the words "or otherwise." What does "or otherwise" mean? Who can say what "otherwise" means?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It must be done under the law.

Mr. LENROOT. But if the Senator says "may be perfected under such laws by discovery or otherwise," what does that mean?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not see any objection to the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see any objection as to the word "discovery," but does not the Senator see any objection to the use of the words "or otherwise"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but the Senator from New Mexico is seeking particularly to have the words "by discovery" inserted.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the first part of the amendment, inserting the words "by discovery," because that is the only way a claim can be perfected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, let the words "by discovery" be inserted.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course, I should like to have the amendment inserting the words "by discovery" accepted alone if I can not get the other; but I can imagine that there are many claims in connection with which annual assessment work has got to be done, and that sort of thing and other laws complied with besides the requirement as to discovery.

Mr. SMOOT. We provide for that in section 36, where the Senator wishes to add the suggested amendment to the provision at the end of the bill so as to make it read:

Existent at date of the passage of this act and thereafter maintained in compliance with the laws under which initiated, which claims may be perfected under such laws by discovery.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Suppose we use the words "Including discovery."

Mr. SMOOT. Very well; if the Senator desires to insert the words "including discovery" I shall offer no objection.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was going to say to Senators that to my mind discovery does not necessarily perfect the claim, because the claimant would not be entitled to a patent unless he had performed $500 worth of work, and in a just sense his claim would not be protected.

Mr. SMOOT. The words "under such laws" cover everything—the $500 worth of work, discovery, and everything else.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the words "including discovery," now proposed, it seems to me, will make it plain.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to those words going in the bill.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I move, at the end of line 3, on page 33, that the period be stricken out and the words "including discovery" be added.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does not the Senator desire a comma after the words "such laws"?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 33, line 3, after the words "perfected under such laws," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "including discovery."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I wish to say that I thank the Senator very much for conceding that amendment. I am sure it will relieve a good many apprehensions which I am satisfied Senators believe have no real foundation, but it is desirable to have everything put beyond any question of doubt.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield the floor?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wish to call attention to another amendment. I do not desire to take up very much further the time of the Senate in explaining it, but it seems to me that we are granting a privilege here to people who happen to have made locations on the 31st of December, 1918, rather than on the 1st of January of this year. A person who made a location on the 31st of December is given a preference right to a permit, while no such privilege is accorded to the man who made his location on the 1st of January or subsequent to that date. If we are going to permit a locator prior to the 1st of January to have a preference right to a permit, then I do not see why we should not bring that down to date. Certainly no harm can be done, because in order to get an original permit under this bill one only has to go upon the ground and put a stake there, claiming a right or stating that he is going to apply for a permit. That will give him a preference right for 30 days to make his application for a permit. Why, therefore, should people who made such locations prior to the 1st of January have a greater right than those who have made a location since the 1st of January?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if a person made a location before the 1st day of January, 1919, he will have performed $250 worth of work. The Senator knows what the practice is throughout the West with relation to mining claims of various kinds. I have tried to secure the passage by Congress for the last five or six years of an act preventing the location of a mining claim and at the beginning of the next year, no work having been done meanwhile, the relocation by the same person of the same claim. If there were a location on January 1, 1919, and the occupant was a bona fide one at the time, certainly the Senator believes there ought to be expended $250 upon that claim by the time he gets his permit or by the time of the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the Senate and to make the statement I have made regarding it. I do not believe that it is of very much importance, because if the parties have already located the land they can go and put up another stake as soon as this bill passes and comply with the law, and, inasmuch as they are on the ground and have the first opportunity, they will have the first chance, at least, of getting a prospecting permit.

Mr. SMOOT. They have the information now as to where they want to locate as against all the world.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Indeed, that is so.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not press the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the members of the committee feel that the change should not be made, I shall not press the amendment further, because I am anxious that this bill shall pass, and I do not want to consume any further the time of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thank the chairman and other members of the committee for their courtesy during this discussion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit, I desire to offer an amendment as a separate section to come in at the end of the bill. The justice of it, I think, will appeal to everyone, and probably it will require no discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new section, to be known as section 38, as follows:

SEC. 38. In the case of permits or leases embracing lands——

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to ask the Senator from Montana if it would not be very much better to strike out, after the word "further," in line 13, page 18, down to and including line 7, on page 19, and let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana be inserted at the place where the words are stricken out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will say to the Senator that I think that will be an appropriate place for another amendment, which I shall offer when the pending amendment is disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator had offered the amendment, copy of which I have in my hand.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; this is a different amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 38, as follows:

SEC. 38. In the case of permits or leases embracing lands entered as agricultural lands or to which patent may have been issued reserving to the United States the oil or other mineral therein provisions shall be made in such permits or leases as the Secretary of the Interior may by rule prescribe, to minimize the damage to any bona fide entryman or patentee or his assigns which may ensue by reason of any operations carried on in prospecting for or extracting or removing oil or other mineral from the premises and for compensation to such entryman or patentee or his assigns for such damage as may be done by such operations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, to strike out the last proviso in section 19 and to insert as a separate section the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendmnt will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, in section 19, after the word "section," in line 22, strike out all down to and including line 7, on page 19, and insert as a separate section the following:

SEC. —. In the case of lands bona fide entered as agricultural, but not including lands claimed under any railroad grant, the entryman shall be entitled to a preference right to a permit and to a lease as herein provided in case of discovery; and within an area not greater than a township entrymen may combine their holdings not to exceed 2,560 acres for the purpose of making joint application. Leases executed under this section and embracing only lands so entered shall provide for the payment of a royalty of not less than 7½ per cent as to such areas within the permit as may not be included within the discovery lease to which the permittee is entitled under section 14 hereof.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I take it for granted that the construction is that as to the lands that are included in the discovery the 5 per cent will apply.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The 5 per cent portion will apply. I merely desire to state that the section is intended to take care of the case of lands that have already been entered by homestead entry or other similar entries, not including lands claimed under railroad grant. The express authority is given to the Secretary of the Interior to lease those lands or to issue a permit for the prospecting of those lands, care being taken not to damage the entryman any more than is necessary, as provided in the section just adopted. The homestead entryman is given a preference right under this to the prospecting permit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	New	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Kellogg	Norris	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Nugent	Spencer
Curtis	Kenyon	Page	Sterling
Gay	King	Phelan	Thomas
Gore	La Follette	Reed	Trammell
Harding	Lenroot	Sheppard	Walsh, Mass.
Harrison	Lodge	Shields	Walsh, Mont.
Henderson	McNary	Simmons	Williams
Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Smith, Ariz.
Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smith, Ga.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] are detained on public business.

Mr. KING. The senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll call discloses only 42 Senators present, not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCCUMBER and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. KNOX, Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. FALL, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. SWANSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed the floor in continuation of the speech begun by him on Wednesday. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether there has been a vote taken in the Senate during the pendency of this bill upon the question of increasing the amount of acreage that any municipality may have under the terms of the bill over and above the amount of 320 acres, named on page 6, section 8, lines 17 and 18, to 2,560 acres?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there has been no vote taken upon that. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] offered an amendment, but withdrew it before a vote was taken, after an explanation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have the usual difficulty of never being able to hear the Senator from Utah. May I ask him to repeat his answer?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin asked whether there had been a vote taken in the Senate—that is, while the bill was in the Committee of the Whole, I suppose he meant——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The bill is still in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. As to increasing the acreage allowed to municipalities, found in section 8 of the bill, on page 6.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I heard the Senator's question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Increasing it from 320 acres to 2,560 acres. I do not want to offer an amendment upon any identical proposition upon which there has already been a vote in the Committee of the Whole, of course.

Mr. SMOOT. And I stated to the Senator that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] had an amendment similar to that and had offered it, but, upon explanation, he withdrew the amendment, and that there had been no vote taken upon that question in the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment was adopted in committee.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. No; this is a new bill—that is right.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the original bill was 160 acres and the committee made it 320.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then there has been no vote upon that amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I simply wanted to be certain about that fact.

At this point in my discussion, Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment; and if I am offering an amendment that has been voted upon I hope I will be so advised by the Senator from Utah, who, I take it, has kept tab upon all amendments offered.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I have.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I propose, if there is no amendment pending before the Senate, on page 6, in section 8, in lines 17 and 18, after the figures "320," to insert the following: "And 1,000 acres for a municipality of not less than 100,000 population or more than 150,000 population, and for a municipality of 150,000 population or more the right to acquire 2,560 acres."

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it is proper that that number of acres of coal should be turned over to the municipalities of the West, I am not going to object; but I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the former bills have provided for only 160 acres. That is all that has ever been considered and that has ever been asked by the cities of the West.

The coal is generally located, as the Senator knows, in the mountains. If there are any little towns around nearby that can haul it they would not want more than 25 or 30 acres of coal land; but under the bill it is provided that it shall be given to the city outright, that they shall have the operation of it for their own use, and then under the bill if a city wants to go into the coal business they can take a lease just the same as any other corporation.

Senators from the West thought it would be unfair and unjust to stand here upon the floor of the Senate and ask the Government of the United States to give to little municipalities, for instance, like hundreds in my own State, more than 320 acres. In the past it has been 160 acres, but if the Senator from Wisconsin thinks it is proper that the Government should turn over this number of acres of coal land, or tie it up there to be used by the city alone, I am not going to object and I will accept the amendment as far as I am concerned. However, I do not think it is proper.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me say upon that one point that I am very desirous that municipalities shall have the opportunity to get an ample supply of coal as nearly at cost as possible for the benefit of the public. I have not been able to have data accessible during the consideration of the bill to determine just what relation a certain acreage should bear to a certain municipal population. When the bill gets into the Senate I may want to change materially the figures of this amendment which I now offer.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator kindly give those figures again?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment which I propose would follow after the 320 acres provided in the bill for a municipality, and would permit a municipality with a population of over 100,000 and not more than 150,000 to have 1,000 acres of coal land.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That was my recollection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And that for municipalities with a population of more than 150,000 there might be the maximum provided for private individuals or corporations here.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That would reach the cities of Denver, Salt Lake, Seattle, and Portland.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to have the acreage proposal of my amendment carefully considered, and, as I say, I may desire to change these figures myself in Committee of the Whole. Perhaps by the time we get into the Senate with this feature of the bill we will all of us have a better perspective of the whole situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I trust the Senator from Wisconsin will understand that the suggestion I addressed to him was not in a critical attitude.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was for the purpose of bringing out the operation of the amendment. It is perfectly satisfactory to me, and I shall offer no objection to it, but I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that it affects just four cities, Denver, Salt Lake, Seattle, and Portland.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very glad to have that noted in the RECORD, and I think that will lead me to modify the amendment when we get into the Senate or possibly to offer another amendment in committee if the bill at the next session of the Senate should still be before the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to suggest to my colleague that instead of 1,000 acres he make it 1,280 acres, which would comprise two sections or legal subdivisions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that should be done, and perhaps the number of population affected ought to be changed. I adopt the suggestion of my colleague, and it is very likely I shall want to modify this amendment further myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to help the Senator from Wisconsin if I can in this matter, because I am perfectly willing to accept anything the Senator wants in relation to acreage, after the explanation I make.

I will say to the Senator as far as my State is concerned 320 acres of coal land would be sufficient, and we have enough coal in that State to last the world for 300 years. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and to furnish them cheap coal, if it is not cornered in some way. .

Mr. SMOOT. Let us leave that out now. So, if Salt Lake City, the largest city that we have in the State, and either of the cities named by the Senator from Montana——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the population of Salt Lake?

Mr. SMOOT. Three hundred and forty thousand. If either of these cities filed on 320 acres of coal land, that city could not work it out possibly in 100 years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me interrupt the Senator right there.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know, but let me interrupt the Senator. Does the Senator mean to say that the average 320 acres that might be selected in the vicinity of Salt Lake City would last the population of that city for the period that he has just named?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that they could take a vein in some of the coal districts in Emery County and in the counties adjacent to Emery and it would last Salt Lake City for that length of time, because of the fact that the vein runs through range after range, not ranges of mountains, but section after section of mountains, and in all that has ever been developed in the past there have been these large veins of coal. I will state to the Senator that they have been working there for fully 30 years now and sending coal to Butte, Mont., and to California, furnishing coal to every city in the State and sending it into Nevada, and it has hardly made a showing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sure that it will be wise statesmanship to devote some time to this provision, and provide an ample supply of coal to every municipality.

This morning, while I was off the floor of the Senate, I looked up a bill introduced by the late Senator Teller, of Colorado, upon this subject. It will be remembered that he had a long period of service in the United States Senate and was for several years Secretary of the Interior. I hope to get time to go over his bill and, if possible, to look up any discussion or any observation which he may have made upon it in the Senate. It was my privilege to be associated with Senator Teller upon a committee in my early service in the Senate. He was one of the wisest men who have been in the Senate of the United States in the last generation of time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have a suggestion to make in connection with this matter for the consideration of all the Senators who have given their attention to the question raised by the Senator from Wisconsin. Municipalities may select the land under this provision of the bill anywhere upon the public domain. The city of Seattle may come over into my State——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just let me conclude.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course they would be moved by the consideration of transportation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the cost of mining and all those things that enter into the economies of the cost of production.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly. We would, of course, be glad to have the city of Seattle or any other municipality come to our State for the purpose of developing the coal lands, but under the provisions of the bill a royalty is paid in commercial operations upon the coal, restricted by the act not to exceed 20 cents per ton. One half of that, or 45 per cent, goes into the State treasury, and the other goes into the reclamation fund. The Senator will remember that only 10 per cent is reserved for administration purposes. So our State would lose, in that case, the contribution to the reclamation fund and the contribution to the treasury. I submit to the Senator whether, under those circumstances, the selection should not be made within the State in which the municipality is located?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize that at once as a consideration that ought to be weighed in connection with such an amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to have the amendment accepted with the idea that it embodies mature judgment upon my part in offering it.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think very likely I shall want to modify it. I have offered it, and I will let it stand as offered for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 18, after the word "acres," it is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to insert "1,280 acres for a municipality of not less than 100,000 and not more than 150,000 population, and 2,560 acres for a municipality of 150,000 population or more."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word before the amendment is adopted. I am in favor of it, but I would not wish any implication to rest that the committee has not sought to do full justice to every community that would be affected by the amendment.

The fact is that those representing the West immediately affected have never asked for more than 160 acres, and that has been the amount included in previous bills. It was proposed by the conservation commission that in this bill the amount should be increased to 2,560 acres, but that was not done, for the reason that unless there be classification, and classification was never suggested by anyone, to give every little community 2,560 acres would enable them to tie up perhaps all the valuable coal lands in a given vicinity, and it seemed unfair to give that privilege to a little community where in a thousand years perhaps that community would not have exhausted more than a fraction of the 2,560 acres of coal. But with the classification that is now proposed by my colleague I think it is entirely fair, and I think it should be adopted.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I merely desire to inquire if the provisions of the bill with reference to corporations are applicable to municipal corporations as well as private corporations, and entitle municipal and private corporations to take equal advantage of the provisions of the bill?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I do not think a municipal corporation could file upon this land and simply hold it without doing anything with it for its own use. But if they had 2,560 acres, the largest city might mine only 10,000 tons a year. If that were sufficient for their own needs they would not need to mine any more.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just one word. I remember from a very hurried reading this morning of Senator Teller's bill that he provides for townships acquiring certain areas, and then provides for municipalities or incorporated cities acquirng a larger area of coal lands. I am sure that the areas as he had worked them out, however, are for certain populations within the scope of his bill considerably more than 320 acres. I only mention this that it may invite the attention of Senators who may be interested to go into the record of that time with a view to getting all the suggestions available upon this subject.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. I suggest this for the consideration of the Senator. It may be that he can reach the object he is seeking to attain in this way: Amend the bill in such manner as to provide that all municipal corporations may make application for leases and secure them on the same terms and conditions as private corporations or individuals on tracts of land not to exceed, say, 50,000 acres, with the further proviso that such municipal corporations shall have a preference right to leases except as to applications of the discoverer or discoverers of the coal field. By making such blanket provision it would appear to me that it would leave discretion in the Secretary of the Interior to determine the number of acres of land that should be leased to each municipal corporation, and I apprehend that the population of the community would enter into that calculation.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Idaho that there is no question of discovery as to coal lands. There are 47,700,000 acres of known coal lands which have been withdrawn. It is only a question of the Secretary of the Interior issuing permits.

Mr. NUGENT. I submit, however, Mr. President, that there may be other coal lands that have not yet been discovered.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, but I will assure the Senator, if the policy in the future is as it has been in the past, if they are discovered they will be withdrawn. Under the provisions of the bill, entirely outside of section 8, a city may make a lease for 2,560 acres.

Mr. NUGENT. I am well aware of that fact, I will say to the Senator from Utah, but I was suggesting that in order to reach the point the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] evidently is endeavoring to arrive at, instead of limiting the acreage there might be a provision to the effect that the acreage should not exceed, say, 50,000 acres, and that a municipality may be granted a lease for any number of acres within that limit that the Secretary of the Interior may deem advisable.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator would say 50,000 acres, it would require only a few towns to take up the entire acreage of coal lands in some of the States.

Mr. NUGENT. That is the reason I suggested that the quantity of land should not exceed 50,000 acres, so that it might be only 200 acres or 500 acres or 1,000 acres, as the Secretary of the Interior might determine.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not conceive how a city containing even 1,000,000 people would want 2,560 acres of coal land. I do not think the city of New York would want that much coal land even if it were within two or three hundred miles of the city of New York—and at a greater distance the hauling is quite an expensive item, so that there arises the question of the economical handling of coal. There would be no necessity for that city having 2,560 acres of coal land, because if it were any kind of a coal vein at all, if it were any kind of a coal field whatever, I do not know how many hundreds of years it would take to work it out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] that municipalities shall undertake the mining of coal under this bill, with a view of making a profit out of it, does not appeal to me. It does seem to me that we ought to be able to get some ratio between the average production of coal per acre in the section of country that is to be affected by this bill and the population of townships and municipalities to be supplied, and that we ought to provide that there shall be opportunity for population, urban and inter urban—the people residing in townships, in villages, and in cities—to have access to the coal that nature has stored for the use of man without being required to pay a profit to some corporation or some individual fortunate enough to secure a lease upon it through the privileges accorded them by other sections of this bill. Therefore I should like to see a provision wrought out of this bill as to public coal lands that would furnish to every section of the population that may be economically reached such coal as they may need at the naked cost of mining and delivering it for consumption.

Mr. NUGENT. If the Senator please, I should have not the slightest objection to that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sure the Senator would not.

Mr. NUGENT. And I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the section of the bill which he is seeking to amend provides in terms that the coal mined by a municipal corporation shall be disposed of without profit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. What I am saying has been elicited by the suggestion, as I understood the Senator, that municipalities should have a right to acquire areas of coal to mine for profit.

Mr. NUGENT. Oh, no.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I, doubtless, misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. NUGENT. I merely desire that it may be acquired by them upon the same terms and conditions as are provided in the bill under which private corporations and individuals may acquire the land and mine the coal, but that the acreage shall not be limited to 2,560 acres; in other words, that a municipal corporation shall be entitled to a lease to more than 2,560 acres of land if, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be necessary and advisable that it be given the larger amount.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see how a municipality would have a very direct interest in prosecuting coal mining operations, excepting to supply the people within the municipality all the coal that they might need for fuel and lighting purposes, and to supply the municipality itself with whatever coal it might need for municipal power purposes and all that. I should like to see this particular legislation worked out with that care which would inaugurate a new era, so to speak, in providing coal at a low cost for at least some of the needy people of the country while we are disposing of coal lands out of which mining companies are certain to make large profits.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad that the Senator from Wisconsin has again brought this subject to our attention. Perhaps it was disposed of with undue haste the other day when the amendment was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. Another idea has occurred to me which lends support to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin that the acreage might very properly be increased. I dare say, Mr. President, that that provision of the bill might be utilized by municipalities for the purpose of inducing manufacturers to locate within their limits, where they would be supplied with coal at cost. I dare say that it would have a tendency to build up manufactories in cities that might be able to avail themselves of this provision of the bill. If the Senator will pardon me, I have written out an amendment to express the idea to which I referred a few moments ago. The amendment would follow immediately after that offered by the Senator from Wisconsin which has just been adopted and would read as follows:

> The land to be selected within the State wherein the municipal applicant may be located.

I offer that amendment if the Senator has no other amendment he desires to present now.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Has the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin been adopted?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not think the amendment has been adopted as yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin has not yet been adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood it had been.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Montana suggests a broader application of the provisions we are discussing. I can see that in the next decade, or in the next quarter of a century, possibly, every city of any considerable population in this country may develop municipal heating plants. We say that a certain amount of coal is all that is needed for the purposes of a municipality now; but 25 years from now all community cooking, heating, and lighting and other necessary conveniences may be provided by municipalities at cost. We may have a common kitchen for every municipality; we may have a system of heating as well as lighting, under which no individual and no home will be charged with the burden of managing a furnace or a heating plant. All of us know that there is a certain waste in the individual operation of such plants, and in the progress that may be made in the next quarter of a century there may be uses for coal in every little center of population away beyond what we see now in the haste of the hour in passing this legislation.

The amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana with regard to the municipality being limited to the confines of the State in which it is located in its selection of coal land raises this question in my mind: There may be many municipalities within easy reach of coal fields lying just over the line in another State, and if such municipalities are to be restricted to coal fields within the limits of their own State or Commonwealth they might be compelled to transport coal 100, 200, or 300 miles. The public lands belong to all the people of the country, and I do not know whether it would be just and fair to provide such a restriction. It may be that it will be necessary for us to modify some of the other provisions of the bill in connection with this matter in order to do justice to the situation under consideration. I should be very glad to hear the view of the Senator from Montana upon that subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I appreciate that the condition suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin might very easily occur; it might be that, by reason of a State line, a little community would be denied access to a coal mine on the other side of the State line——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It might be a great city.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It might be a great city; but let me submit to the Senator from Wisconsin that one can very readily conceive of a city of 100,000 people on the Wyoming side of the line, between Montana and Wyoming, in close proximity to a coal bed upon the Montana side. Under the provisions of the Senator's amendment they would get a coal area of 1,280 acres, the coal from which would be constantly withdrawn from our State over onto the other side. It would help to build up that city, increase its assessed valuation, and enable it to have all of the benefits, while the community from which the coal was drawn would have nothing whatever of its own natural resources with which to build up the community upon its side of the line. It could not tax the lands because they belong to the United States. We hope to reach that by the provisions of the bill under which the State gets a part of the royalty derived from the coal; but in this case there would be no royalty and the community from which the resource was drawn would be impoverished to enrich the community upon the other side. It would not be just.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I see some force in the suggestion of the Senator, and yet here there is, we will say, a community of 150,000 or 250,000 people. The city is built close to the line of the State. It is a source of benefit as a city, as a distributing point, not only to the people on one side of the State line, but to the people across the line in the other State. Now, suppose you exclude that municipality from having any right to enter upon a coal field that is just over the line in order to take care of the needs of that municipality, and you compel it to go, we will say, 200 miles in another direction and pay transportation charges to railroad companies in order to supply coal to the municipality. That would seem to be very wasteful.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just let me conclude, if you please, on that point, and then I will yield. Suppose you do that, and you reserve, as suggested by the Senator from Montana, this desirable coal area contiguous to the municipality for private enterprise to develop, and a company goes in there, or an individual takes up 2,560 acres, acquires a monopoly of the coal supply of that particular section, and is able to make the people living in that municipality pay excessive charges for coal to supply their needs up to the very limit of long-distance transportation. That would hardly seem to be either fair or wise. Taking this country by and large, and remembering that the public lands belong to the people of this whole country, does it not appeal to the Senator as being a fair proposition that we should work out some plan by which each municipality can be supplied by the near-by deposit of coal?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I fully agree with the Senator, and it would not be precluded at all from taking this particular tract of land. It would simply escape, under this provision, the payment of the royalty. Under the general provisions of the bill——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, no. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him, but under the plan proposed by the Senator the feature of the bill which we are now considering, if I understood the Senator's amendment, would not apply to this municipality.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And it would not be permitted to take this coal, excepting it paid the royalty to the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just exactly like a private enterprise going in there to mine for profit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. That is to say, Mr. President, the municipality upon the other side of the line would be obliged, if it desired to take the coal, to take it under the general provisions of the act, just the same as any other one paying the royalty prescribed by the act, which will not be to exceed 20 cents. In other words, we will compel that municipality to contribute a small portion to the public lands of the State from which it takes the coal; that is all. It still has the opportunity. It just simply is obliged to pay the royalty. It is not debarred at all. So that at the most it could only increase the cost of the coal to the consumer 20 cents a ton.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. By the amount of the royalty which is exacted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By the amount of the royalty, and one-half of that royalty would go to the treasury of the State out of which the coal had been taken, because, the land being held by the Government and the title being in the Government, it would not be subject to taxation by the local authorities; and so it contributes its share to the support of the government of the State from which the coal is taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think there is force in the proposition which the Senator has now presented. As first stated, I did not understand that the municipality would be permitted to take the coal under any circumstances. I missed that point in the statement of his amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I would not have the Senator misunderstand me. My amendment does not so provide, but the general provisions of the bill so provide. My amendment touches only the securing of the coal without the payment of royalty.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly. It was for that reason that I overlooked the point. I can see that the municipality or the city in question, which we are supposing in the hypothetical case under discussion, would only be required to pay not to exceed 20 cents per ton as a royalty for the coal mined in the contiguous territory over the State line. I can see that that does not impose any very considerable hardship upon any municipality; and I do not at this moment desire, therefore, to interpose any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It comes in after the amendment tendered by the Senator from Wisconsin and now adopted.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted it is proposed to insert the following:

The land to be selected within the State wherein the municipal applicant may be located.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to say that I have a discussion that I want to present to the Senate bearing upon sections 18 and 19. I do not desire to do so this afternoon, with 48 hours or more intervening between the time I submit my observations on the subject dealt with in those sections and the time when I shall propose amendments to the sections. Therefore I am taking up other amendments now to fill in the time, because I do not desire to make that argument to-night. I wish to make it approximately near the time when the Senate will vote upon sections 18 and 19, to which the discussion relates. So, Mr. President, in order to occupy the time of the Senate, as the Senator in charge of the bill desires to go on with its consideration——

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will.

Mr. HARRISON. Do I understand the Senator to mean by that that he is taking up the time of the Senate merely to utilize the time until next Tuesday may come?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I tried to make myself clear upon that point. I have some observations here and some facts which I desire to lay before the Senate with respect to the amendments which I shall offer to sections 18 and 19, which I conceive to be most important sections of this bill. As it is Saturday afternoon, and we are to adjourn over until next Tuesday, I do not wish to make the argument which I have prepared upon those provisions two or three days before they are to be voted upon. I wish to make it in connection with the sections when they shall come up for the consideration of the Senate. I have some other amendments here with which I can occupy the time of the Senate for the balance of the afternoon, amendments which will have to be considered by the Senate, and so no waste of the Senate's time will be involved in taking up those amendments now. That was my purpose, and that was what I meant when I suggested the consideration of my other amendments.

Mr. HARRISON. I was thinking that if the Senator merely wanted to occupy the time in order to pass away the time until next Tuesday——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. There are some other matters which we might consider to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not desire to do that. I could fill in the time by general talk upon this subject of conservation if it were merely to do that. I am not occupying the time of Senate in that way, but I thought I could take up some other amendments which I consider less important than those intended to perfect sections 18 and 19.

Mr. HARRISON. I thought the Senator might consent, together with the Senator from Utah, if he merely wanted to kill time——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRISON. That we might take up the bill which is here, which has already passed the House at the urgent request of the President, to amend the food-control act in order that we may get at the profiteers in this country. That bill would take very little discussion, in my opinion, and we could pass it very quickly. It has been on the calendar now for a week. It has been over three weeks since the President asked us to take action. The House passed it some two weeks ago. It does seem to me that we are fiddling while the profiteers are bleeding the country, and that we ought to do something.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I shall be very glad to take it up. I do not think it is the solution of the problem, by any means——

Mr. HARRISON. Well, it might aid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But I am very glad to give my assent to its immediate consideration, and I shall not stand in the way of a motion to that effect, if the Senator desires to make one; and he is at liberty to make it if he is in earnest about this thing. I will yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I am very much in earnest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I will yield the floor to the Senator to make his motion.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Utah allow us to take it up?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not necessary for the Senator from Utah to allow the Senator to take it up. The Senator from Utah does not control the matter. I have the floor. I will yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I call up the bill——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator can make the motion. He can not call it up except by motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the Senator does that, allow me to say a word. The Senator from Wisconsin has now yielded the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is winking at me, and I do not know just what he means.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I mean, if the Senator wants to make a motion, if he is in earnest about taking up this bill, let him proceed. That is what I mean.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator from Utah desire to ask me a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I did.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator did want to ask a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I do not want the oil-leasing bill displaced as the unfinished business, nor do I want to stop its consideration. There are amendments here that the Senator from Wisconsin has in printed form that he intends to offer. If he does not offer them now he will offer them Tuesday or at some other time. They will all be offered. The situation is just as he says—that the two amendments referred to were amendments to sections 17 and 18 of the bill, but the other amendments do not apply to those sections at all; and I want the Senator from Wisconsin to offer those amendments now and let us go right on with the leasing bill.

Mr. HARRISON. Would the Senator consent to our displacing this bill and let us take up the other bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Not if I can help it; no.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I occupy a very modest position on the Agricultural Committee, but I told the chairman of that committee that I would notify him whenever we could get up the food-control bill, and he wants to call up that bill, and it is of vital importance. Not only does it carry a penalty and provide a punishment for profiteers in foodstuffs, wearing apparel, and other necessaries in this country, but it provides a penalty against these gougers in the District of Columbia, who are extorting from the people unreasonable and exorbitant rates upon houses and apartments; and it seems to me that it is a matter of such urgent necessity that we ought to pass that bill this afternoon.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am concerned, I want to say this: During the number of days that this bill has been before the Senate there has not been a single day but that part of the time has been taken up in the discussion of questions entirely foreign to the bill. Last Wednesday the whole day was taken up by a discussion of the league of nations. Not one word was said about the oil-leasing bill and not a reference was made to it. What I want the Senate to do—and I asked the Senate last night to do it to-day—is to consider the pending bill; and I should like to have them stay here at nighttime, as I said last night, to do it. This is Saturday, and, of course, I know that it is hard to keep a quorum here Saturday; but there is a quorum here, and the Senator from Wisconsin is willing now to offer his amendments to the bill, and I ask the Senator from Mississippi to allow him to proceed.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, I do not want to disarrange the plan. I wish the chairman of the Agricultural Committee were here to call up the measure to which I have referred. I wish we could get consent to do it, because I do not believe there will be any opposition to this food-control bill. We could pass it quickly, and then go on with this leasing proposition that has been running wild for several days.

Mr. SMOOT. It will lead to discussion. Other bills that are just as important as that are waiting for the passage of this bill. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has given notice several times that he intends to take up the prohibition bill just as soon as this measure is passed; but the question is entirely in the hands of the Senate as to either this bill or any other bill. The Senate so far has said, however, that this bill should be the unfinished business, and I have kept it before the Senate now ever since it was made the unfinished business. If the Senate really wants to pass this bill, and, if it is not done to-night, will stay here with me Tuesday, when we intend to meet again, I will stay here all night Tuesday night, and all day Wednesday, if necessary, until it is passed. That is the way to pass the legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that the Senator from Utah has been expediting the bill as much as he could; but we have been considering it now for possibly a week or more, four days of which have been taken up by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the proponents of this bill have not occupied three hours altogether on the bill. Now, let us get down to the amendments, and let us vote upon the amendments, and get through.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. I simply wish to say that more than a week ago I gave notice that upon the disposal of the oil-leasing bill I would move the consideration of the prohibition bill. That is a bill of great importance, too; of vital importance at this time. First, it is important because of the need of a law to enforce war-time prohibition; secondly, it is time that a law was enacted to carry into effect prohibition under the constitutional amendment. It is of vast importance, and I shall insist on taking up that bill immediately on the disposition of this bill, and object to the taking up of any other bill.

I want to say that there will be long discussion over the bill mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi. It will not pass, I think, in as short order as the Senator from Mississippi seems to think.

Mr. HARRISON. I will say to the Senator from South Dakota that I realize the importance of the prohibition legislation, and I am very much in favor of it, but the food-control bill, in my opinion, is most urgent and most necessary. It was a matter of such vital importance that when the Congress, controlled by a Republican majority in the House, saw fit to take a recess, and had made its plans for a recess and those plans were accepted by a Republican majority in the Senate, the President called them together and asked them to stay here and not recess. He came to Congress and delivered a message in which he pointed out the high cost of living and the necessity for some speedy action in the matter of amending the food-control act. The Attorney General came before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and set forth the weapons that he had with which he could fight the profiteers, and stated specifically the amendments that he desired in order that he might carry on this crusade in the country.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry allowed two weeks to pass before it took action, but finally it awoke from its lethargy and reported out the bill favorably. That was over a week ago. The House acted speedily on it. They passed the bill nearly two weeks ago, and the bill that passed the House and the one that is now on the calendar of the Senate are practically the same, except that the latter proposes to take care of the rent profiteers in the District of Columbia.

While the prohibition bill is very important and should be considered immediately, perhaps, the urgency is not there that attaches to the food-control legislation. The country is expecting the United States Senate to act, because the man who to-day works upon a fixed income, with a family to support, can not do it with the profiteers running mad in the country. The responsibility is upon us, not upon the Department of Justice, when we withhold from them the weapons that they ask us to give to them.

While I do not wish to disarrange the plans of the leaders on the other side, I am quite sure any motion I might make to displace consideration of the pending bill and take up the food-control bill would not prevail; yet it does seem to me that the food-control bill should be passed, and should be passed immediately, if we are going to give any relief to the country, and

I plead with the Senators that they at the very earliest moment possible take some action and carry out the recommendations of the department.

Mr. LENROOT. Will not the Senator add to his statement the fact that for nearly two years the President has had and to-day has the fullest power over hoarders of foodstuffs and fuel, over extortionate prices, under stringent penalties, and until three weeks ago neither the President of the United States nor anyone in the administration lifted a finger to prevent it?

Mr. HARRISON. It is very true that there was a food-control law in existence that did provide a penalty for hoarding, but it is not true that the act carried with it any provision that made it possible to go after an individual who was extorting from the people high, exorbitant prices for products that were sold, and it is to cure that defect that the Attorney General has asked us to amend the law. We add a penalty that did not exist before, and we propose to so amend the law that the Department of Justice can indict the individuals who are making exorbitant charges.

I warn each Senator here that the responsibility is upon his shoulder to help the Department of Justice in this crusade at this time to reduce the high cost of living.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I yielded to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] in the hope that he would have the courage of his convictions and come to the rescue of the suffering country and especially the District of Columbia, and would offer a motion to take up the bill in question. I said when I yielded that I would yield to him to make that motion. I thought he really wanted to make it, but apparently he wished to enter upon the RECORD here an appealing statement that President Wilson and the Attorney General were all ready to rescue the people of the District and of the country from the profiteers if they could only get a chance to get the legislation through. I am very glad my colleague pointed to that proposition——

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Presently. I should like to complete this statement.

There is abundant legislation upon the statute books, not only recent legislation, not only the legislation enacted in connection with the war, but legislation broader and more far-reaching than that, legislation which the President of the United States specifically was pledged to enforce by his platform and by declarations made again and again in the campaign of 1912, which he has wholly ignored, neglected, and repudiated. Now he comes to the Congress after the people have been gouged by the profiteers for six years of his administration, during which time the cost of living increased hour by hour. Not a month has gone by since Woodrow Wilson was elected President of the United States that the high cost of living did not advance upon the American people, month by month. If one studies the trend of prices long before we got into the war, one will note the constant advance in the cost of living, and no determined prosecution of the trust officials which the Democratic platform and the President in his campaign of 1912 assured the American people would be prosecuted criminally if once he and the Democratic Party were entrusted with the control of the Government.

Now he asks for additional legislation after more than six years of procrastination, while the cost of living advanced so shockingly. It advanced before we went into the war. No one need rise here and say that the President has been occupied with the prosecution of the war, and that that prevented his redeeming the pledges that he made in so many speeches over the country in 1912, and the solemn pledges that were in the Democratic platform. Yet not a hand was raised. Look at the Democratic platform. There is a specific pledge in the platform of 1912, first preceded by a charge that the Republican administration had not prosecuted criminally a single trust official, followed by the statement that the Democratic Party, if empowered by the people with their votes in that campaign, would proceed to the criminal prosecution of trust officials. Not a criminal prosecution, so far as I can recall, and I am pretty sure the record will bear me out in that statement, can be cited. What does it mean?

That was not all. The next specific pledge in that platform was that the burning question—I do not quote the exact language, but that is the meaning—that the burning question before the American people was the increase in the cost of living; that it was due to private monopolistic control of prices, and that if the Democratic Party was intrusted with power it would put an end to private monopoly in the United States. I am going to bring in on the floor here some day that specific language. I thought I had it in my notes here to-day. I can lay it before the Senate in specific terms.

Then there was a third promise that they would destroy all "criminal commercial conspiracies" that increased the cost of living. They had ample power under the law to do it. They arraigned the Republican Party because it had not used the laws on the statute books to achieve that end. It was the indictment, the charge, that the Republican Party ought to be displaced because it had not prosecuted private monopoly. I think the charge was well founded. I agree that the growth of monopolies and trusts and combinations and the steady increase in the cost of living was due, up to the time Woodrow Wilson came in, to a dereliction of duty on the part of two Republican administrations. But what hope is there for the American people when another party comes in and another President, more distinctly and more positively and concretely pledged to free the American people from the bondage, and repudiates the promise made in the platform upon which they were elected?

I say if you study the Democratic platform of 1912, that there never was a clearer-cut issue made than that platform. Nearly all the other subjects, and there were many of them presented in the platform, were passed by and scarcely mentioned. It was the one great question in the presidential campaign of 1912. There never was a campaign in which all other platform pledges were so ignored and the whole contest narrowed to one single issue as was the case in Mr. Wilson's campaign of 1912.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was wondering which two of the four Republican administrations since the enactment of the Sherman Act the Senator referred to and why he accused merely the Democratic administration?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Because there was not any very active organization of trusts until after 1901. It began in a small way in 1898. There really were not very many trusts in this country until we entered upon the period of reorganization of business between 1901 and 1904.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That covered three Republican administrations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but there were very few trusts until after 1901. The highest authority in this country on the organization of combinations limits the number of trusts at the time of the inauguration of President Roosevelt to 149. I stated this on the floor of the Senate yesterday, but the Senator was not here, and I repeat it now. In seven years they increased until there were over 10,000. The best authority on that subject I have been able to find in this country gives those figures, and in his great work on the subject he names them and lists them and sets out their capitalization.

They went on increasing until President Wilson, seizing upon the issue which their growth under Republican administration offered him in 1912, sought the Presidency on that issue. It was the one thing he talked about. The Senator from Montana must remember. I do not think anybody will want to take issue with me on that.

So, Mr. President, I say if the present administration and the present Executive were thoroughly in earnest about freeing the people, and had been since he became the Chief Executive, he would have laid hold of the weapons that were and are at his hand, and have been all the time since he has been President, and would have sought to destroy the great monsters that control in this country. For they have added at least 100 per cent and somewhat more than that, I think, to the cost of living since he has been President of the United States, and a large part of the advance came before we entered the war.

If the Senator from Mississippi would like to have me yield, I yield for a question, or for an interruption, rather.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think this bill ought to have been disposed of before now. The Senator has occupied four days in a discussion of it. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, and is in charge of the proposed legislation to which I have reference. I had hoped he would be on the floor to call it up. I can not myself take the responsibility of calling the bill up, but just as soon as the leasing bill is out of the way—and the quicker the Senator from Wisconsin stops talking the sooner we shall stop the high cost of living if legislation will do it—we shall try to get the bill up and have it passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; and the quicker the oil grafters and the coal grabbers will get hold of the public domain under the terms of this bill if it shall be passed without amendment. That is my view of it.

It is true, Mr. President, I have taken some time on this bill for the last three or four days. But it is only the second time I have occupied the attention of the Senate, I think, during the present session. I will compare space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with other Senators on this floor as to the amount of the public time that I have taken in the discussion of public questions. I am willing to stand on judgment before the American people as to whether I discuss matters that touch the vital issues of government as it affects the life of the American people, or whether I join in filling the RECORD with general conversation on this floor, which occupies the time of the Senate so fully session after session.

I am not responsible to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], or to any other Senator on this floor, for the time that I consume or the subjects that I discuss.

I can not be charged with a narrow, partisan attitude in public life either here or before I came here. So, Mr. President, if I choose to discuss legislation that affects all that is left of the coal, the oil, phosphate, and sodium lands of the public domain, it is only because I seek to aid in bettering, as best we can, those provisions of the bill which grant leases practically in perpetuity.

I will now take up some of the amendments that I have pending to other sections of the bill.

Mr. President, I introduce, so that they may be printed and lie on the table, two other amendments that I have to offer.

I will read one of these amendments, Mr. President, because I think it will especially interest Senators. This amendment will be offered to be inserted on page 2, line 7, after the word "thereof," by adding the following:

And provided further, That the Government hereby reserves the right at all times, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President, to determine, fix, and control the selling price of all products derived from lands leased hereunder, whether in the crude or natural condition or in other merchantable form, which shall be a reasonable price both as to the producer and the consumer; and the reservation of such right shall be expressly stated in each lease.

I think that is an amendment that will commend itself to the good judgment and the patriotism of the Senate. I think it will help to protect the American people from extortionate charges. I think it will be possible for a President who really desires to protect the public to work out some plan by rules and regulations that can be so applied as to control the prices consumers pay for these products. And, Mr. President, I would not be much surprised if it lessened the interest of the lobby that is in attendance here awaiting the enactment of this legislation.

The other amendment to which I have referred I send to the desk and ask to have printed and lie on the table without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 24, after the word "that," it is proposed to strike out all of lines 24 and 25, and, on page 3, to strike out all of lines 1 to 10, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That no common carrier, as defined in the act of February 4, 1887, entitled "An act to regulate commerce and acts amendatory thereof," and no association, any member of which is an officer, agent, or shareholder, or in any manner interested in the business of any common carrier, shall be permitted to hold a license under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, during the discussion of this bill a day or two ago the chairman of the committee stated that under the terms of the bill there was but one railroad company which would be able to acquire any lease upon coal lands, and that that company was the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Co.

Mr. SMOOT. I said it in this way——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may be I am not correctly stating what the Senator said.

Mr. SMOOT. I said that the real reason why the provision was inserted in the bill originally and was retained in its present form was to take care immediately of the Milwaukee Railroad. I do not know whether the Senator has read the provision as it was originally introduced in Senate bill 1269.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that was substantially the same form in which it was before the Senate in the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. It was virtually the same.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I tried to make a comparison of the two, and it seemed to me that it was practically the same.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee received a letter from Mr. Gifford Pinchot calling attention to that provision and asking that the original provision be stricken from the bill and the provision which is now in the bill be substituted therefor. This is the reason assigned for such action by Mr. Pinchot:

The reason for the above suggestion is the uncertainty as to the meaning of the definition of "railroad" or "common carrier," and also the uncertainty as to what is meant by "any company or corporation subsidiary or auxiliary thereto, whether directly or indirectly connected with such railroad or common carrier."

That was the wording, I will say to the Senator, of the original provision.

It is evident that if the relief is given fairly and squarely to the common-carrier railroads the full purpose of the act will be accomplished; and if an attempt is made to do more we can not foresee the consequences.

Therefore the committee accepted the provision suggested by Mr. Pinchot, which is the provision the Senator now seeks to amend.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed his speech. After having spoken for over an hour,

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, partially to allay the fear expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin and further to protect, if possible, the coal areas of the United States, I am going to suggest to the Senator that I myself think that, perhaps, the provision which was suggested by Mr. Pinchot could be greatly restricted by an amendment which I am going to offer. It is as follows: After the word "line," on page 3, line 6, I propose to insert the words "within the State in which the leased property is situated," so that the provision will read:

And such limitations of use shall be expressed in all permits and leases issued to such companies or corporations, and no such company or corporation shall receive or hold more than one permit or lease for each 200 miles of its railroad line within the State in which the leased property is situated, exclusive—

And so forth.

If that amendment is adopted it will be impossible for a railroad to receive more than one permit for acreage authorized in the section unless it has in the State in which the property is leased 400 miles of line. As there is an amendment pending, I shall not now offer this amendment, but in connection with this provision I desire the Senator from Wisconsin to know that I am going to offer the amendment which I have just stated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That seems to me to be a very great improvement upon the bill as it is now worded. If I understand the amendment proposed, it would not permit any one railroad company to secure more than 2,500 acres of coal land within a single State unless its line within the State covered more than 200 miles?

Mr. LENROOT. Not unless its line covered more than 200 miles within the State. It would not be permitted to compute any mileage outside of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. It could not take into account its mileage within any other State.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Suppose the line of the road within the State was more than 200 miles but less than 400 miles, how would that be considered?

Mr. LENROOT. They could secure two leases.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Suppose it was less than 400 miles, say 230 miles, could the railroad then secure two leases under the suggested amendment of the Senator?

Mr. SMOOT. The wording is that no railroad shall be allowed "more than one permit or lease for each 200 miles of its railroad line within the State in which the leased property is situated."

Mr. LENROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was wrong. There could be only one lease up to 400 miles of railroad.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One lease up to 400 miles.

Mr. SMOOT. There could only be one lease for 399 miles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is something of a concession, and I am very glad the Senator is willing to make it.

Mr. SMOOT. I may say to the Senator that I do not know of a railroad which has a direct line of railroad more than 399 miles in length within the borders of a State.

Mr. LENROOT. I think there may be in the State of Wyoming.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not only in Wyoming but in North Dakota and, perhaps, some other States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to understand the purport of the amendment which the Senator from Utah says he will propose.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will take the bill, I will read it again. On page 3, line 6, after the word "line," I propose to insert the words "within the State in which the leased property is situated," so that it will read:

And no such company or corporation shall receive or hold more than one permit or lease for each 200 miles of its railroad line within the State in which the leased property is situated, exclusive of spurs or switches and exclusive of branch lines built to connect the leased coal with the railroad.

Of course, Mr. President, I can not offer that amendment now, inasmuch as there is an amendment already pending.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will withdraw my amendment for the time being, with the permission of the Senate, to give the Senator from Utah the opportunity first to present his amendment. I may wish to renew my amendment in a different form later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 6, after the words "railroad line," it is proposed to insert "within the State in which the leased property is situated."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 5, after the word "emergency," it is proposed to insert:

provisions prohibiting the employment of any boy under the age of 16, or the employment of any girl or woman without regard to age in any mine below the surface.

Mr. SMOOT. I gladly accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, as the amendment just adopted might imply that women and girls are employed underground in coal mining in the public-land States, I feel moved to say that no such condition does exist.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is not prepared to give any bond for the future, I presume, with regard to such employment?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I am not. So the amendment is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there any further amendments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; there are several.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess, it being, under the order heretofore entered, until 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Tuesday, September 2, at 11 a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 2, 1919.

(Legislative day of Saturday, August 23, 1919.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

JOHN D. RYAN.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, there is a subcommittee of a House committee which has been investigating acts of the War Department during the war with Germany and much publicity has been given to the activities of this subcommittee. Among other things of which it has made so-called investigation is the aircraft production of the War Department during the war, which for a time was in charge of Hon. John D. Ryan, of Montana, formerly Assistant Secretary of War. Through the instrumentality of this subcommittee wide publicity has been given through the press to some very grave charges against the official conduct of Mr. Ryan while in charge of aircraft production. So far it seems Mr. Ryan has had no opportunity to appear before the subcommittee and give his version of these charges.

Among those charges is one, loosely made and given much publicity, that he caused to be expended $12,000,000 in the construction of an extension of a railroad, which was done, it is claimed, for the benefit of private interests rather than the public interest. In the Anaconda (Mont.) Standard of the 28th ultimo, Mr. Ryan makes a personal statement, over his signature, in regard to these charges, and in that statement he makes a complete refutation of the charge of the misuse of Government funds in the construction of such railroad extension. He shows conclusively that this work was decided upon, the contract for the work was entered into, and the work was ordered done before Mr. Ryan took charge of the aircraft production of the Government, and that he had nothing whatever to do with the contract or the work in question.

I think it was grossly wrong for the subcommittee to give wide publicity to such charges when it could easily have learned, by going to the records, the fact that Mr. Ryan had nothing whatever to do with it, and that it was decided upon, ordered done, contracted for, and entered upon before he took charge of the aircraft-production work of the Government. I think it was a gross outrage for publicity to be given to those charges under those circumstances. There is another matter which is material which is set right in Mr. Ryan's statement. The charge has been made that the construction of this piece of railroad cost $12,000,000. While Mr. Ryan had nothing to do with it, he shows that the cost was only $4,000,000.

The statement of Mr. Ryan to which I have referred is brief and concise, and in justice to him I here offer it and ask that it be printed in the RECORD. Mr. Ryan has held a very high, honorable, and responsible position under the Government, that of Assistant Secretary of War, and I think this courtesy is due him. I think he has been greatly wronged and justice should be done him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The following statement from John D. Ryan, formerly Director of the Bureau of Aircraft Production, and later Assistant Secretary of War in charge of the entire air program for the United States, was given out yesterday:

"I am informed that certain Montana publications have printed, as charges made against me, certain inquiries in hearings of a subcommittee of Congress investigating aircraft expenditures by the War Department, alleging that I authorized and directed the building of a railroad in the State of Washington by the Government, that was in effect an extension of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway, of which I was a director, and that the road so built cost $12,000,000, and that I was interested in land or timber that it was intended to reach by the building of this railroad.

"These charges were answered fully by Secretary Baker at the hearing before the committee in Washington on August 1. His answer was to the effect that the contract for production of spruce with the Siems-Carey Co., to carry out which this line of railroad was built, was entered into by the proper officers of the spruce-production division on the Pacific coast more than a month before I became Director of Aircraft Production, which was on May 20, 1918. Further, that this contract for the production of spruce was entered into between the officers of the spruce-production division and the contractors, with the agreement and understanding that it was to go into effect upon the signing of a contract between the Government and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. for the building of a certain line of railway which would tap the territory from which this spruce was to be produced. This contract between the Government and the railway company had been negotiated on the Pacific coast and was brought to Washington for execution by the United States Railroad Administration just before the time when I was put in charge of aircraft production. I had no previous knowledge from either the railroad officials or the Government that any such contract was in contemplation. Upon its being brought to my attention I immediately refused to discuss it or have anything to do with it, even in an advisory capacity.

"I referred the whole matter to Secretary Baker, and he testified before the committee that I declined to even advise or confer on the subject, and gave as my reason for it that I was a director of the railway and a member of its executive committee. He called in Mr. Stettinius, who was then Assistant Secretary of War, and in my presence stated that this contract for the building of the railroad had been negotiated, but that the United States Railroad Administration refused to allow the Milwaukee Railway Co. to expend its funds for the construction, the Railroad Administration taking the position that the road was being built not as a railroad enterprise but as a war measure, and that the War Department should furnish the funds for its construction. The Secretary further told Mr. Stettinius that I had stated to him that I was a director of the Milwaukee Railway; that I could and should have nothing to do with the railroad contract, and that Mr. Stettinius should take the matter up and negotiate the contract, which he did. I never saw the contract afterwards. I never signed it. I never directed that anybody else should sign it, and I never had anything to do with the negotiations from the beginning to the end, and Secretary Baker has so testified before the committee. These charges originated in a statement made by the military intelligence officer in a telegram to the War Department dated November 23, 1918.

"My resignations as Assistant Secretary of War and Director of Air Service having just been tendered to the President and Secretary of War, and accepted, were published in the newspapers of the day before. Secretary Baker, upon receipt of this information and at my request, ordered the Inspector General of the Army to have a thorough investigation made and report to him. An officer of the Inspector General's Department was detailed and made such investigation. The Inspector General himself visited the Pacific coast, interviewed witnesses, and checked the investigation of his officer, and reported to the Secretary of War that there was no evidence whatever that would substantiate any of the charges made, and no evidence whatever that myself or any officer of the Government had profited or had tried to profit by any of the operations or expenditures of the spruce-production division that had been investigated, and, further, that instead of the railroad costing the Government $12,000,000, as charged, it had cost less than one-third of that sum completed.

"This whole matter, both the railroad contract and spruce-production contract, had been agreed upon more than a month before I was appointed Director of Aircraft Production or entered the Government service. I had nothing whatever at any time to do with the railroad contract, and the only thing I had to do with the contract with Siems-Carey-Kerbaugh Co. for the production of spruce was to insist in some respects in which I thought the Government had not been sufficiently protected that certain changes be made to insure protection for the Government. Both the original contract and the one entered into after I insisted upon the changes have been called to the attention of the Inspector General and are open records of the Government for anyone to judge whether my changes were in the interest of the Government or of the contractor. I have not and never have had any personal interest in land or timber on the Pacific coast or any enterprise connected with them, except as a shareholder of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway.

"In making this statement that I had nothing whatever to do with the negotiations or execution of the contract between the Government and the Siems-Carey Co. for the building of this railroad, I want to make plain that I believe that the contract was entered into solely in the interest of the Government and of its allies in war; that it was necessary to build that road and to provide for the production of spruce in the territory which it reached to insure a full supply of airplane wood for all of the Allies; that the need was urgent and unprecedented and everything that was done to meet it that had come to my knowledge was done under capable management by men who were acting from patriotic motives and who accomplished a fine piece of work.

"The complaints and criticisms, and I investigated all that were brought to my attention, were made by men who had either endeavored and failed to get contracts for themselves or who had held positions in the Government service which they were not qualified to fill and who had to be removed. The job of spruce production for the Allies and our own Government in the war was, in my opinion, one of the things that helped to bring an early ending of the war, and which reflected credit and honor upon the men who were connected with it, and I am proud of the little I had to do to help carry out the work."

RELATION OF LABOR TO INTERSTATE RAILROADS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I give notice that on Thursday next, after the completion of the morning business or at such opportunity as may offer itself, I desire to address the Senate on the question of the relation of labor to the interstate railroads.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Johnson, Calif.	Newberry	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smoot
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Keyes	Page	Thomas
Cummins	La Follette	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	Lenroot	Pittman	Underwood
Elkins	McCormick	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fall	McNary	Ransdell	Walsh, Mass.
Gronna	Myers	Robinson	Warren
Hale	Nelson	Sheppard	Watson

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] are engaged in business of the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are absent in attendance at a meeting of the subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on public business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. EDGE, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. WALSH of Montana answered to their names when called.

Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. KING, Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. HENDERSON, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. REED, and Mr. HARRIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House, in accordance with the provision of House concurrent resolution No. 29, had appointed as the committee on the part of the House to make arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in the World War, Mr. MONDELL, Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. DENT, and Mr. FIELD.

The message also announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, and Mr. DENT.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2236) relating to the affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PAGE presented resolutions adopted by the Vermont Rural Letter Carriers' Association in convention at Barton, Vt., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for civil-service retirement, for the establishment of a civil-service court of appeals, for a permanent salary of $1,500 per year, and for additional allowances for maintenance of equipment, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Vermont, praying for Federal control and operation of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. MOSES presented petitions of Local Grange No. 212, Patrons of Husbandry, of Haverhill; of Blackwater Grange No. 152, Patrons of Husbandry, of Andover; and of the local grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Hooksett, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WARREN presented a memorial of Local Union No. 1715, United Mine Workers of America, of Carneyville, Wyo., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Topeka, Kans., and a petition of sundry citizens of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Boston, Lowell, Springfield, Medford, Brockton, Fall River, Somerville, Taunton, Haverhill, and Brookline, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations covenant and praying for its separation from the treaty of peace with Germany, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of petitions from sundry American citizens of Greek origin praying for the annexation to Greece of Thrace, Macedonia, Epirus, and the Dodecanese, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2907) for the relief of McAteer Shipbuilding Co. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 2908) to promote efficiency in the Postal Service; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 2909) granting a pension to Richard D. Powers; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2910) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Railway Co. to rebuild and reconstruct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River near Chattanooga, in Hamilton County, in the State of Tennessee," approved April 5, 1916; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2911) granting pensions to certain soldiers and widows of deceased soldiers of the Utah Territorial Militia who served in the Indian wars in Utah Territory, and to amend the act approved March 4, 1917, entitled "An act to pension the survivors of certain Indian wars from January 1, 1859, to January, 1891, inclusive, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2912) to appropriate funds for the immigration inspection of the Department of Labor; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) to declare a legal holiday within the District of Columbia on the day of the review of the First Division of the United States Army; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. KING:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 98) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant revocable licenses for the removal of sand from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation for industrial purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL-RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GRONNA submitted four amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal-reserve act, which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill.

The bill (S. 2906) further to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations and to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the bill I have just introduced is the result of the constant, painstaking work of a subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee for the last three months. I have introduced it at this time for two reasons:

First, that it might be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee as a whole and furnish the basis of the further work of that committee.

Second, because it is a subject of such tremendous importance that it seems to me that at the earliest opportunity the Senate and the public ought to know what we have done as a subcommittee.

It does not represent in every particular the views of every member of the subcommittee, which was composed of Senators POMERENE, ROBINSON, POINDEXTER, KELLOGG, and myself, but it does represent the composite judgment of the subcommittee, and I am very glad to be able to say that the points of difference between the members of the subcommittee are very, very few.

I take this opportunity to explain the bill. I will do so as briefly as it is possible for me to do it intelligently.

The bill proposes to repeal the act of March 21, 1918, commonly known as the Federal-control act. It takes effect at midnight on the last day of the month in which it shall become a law. It returns the railroad properties of the United States to their owners at that time, and it transfers to the Shipping Board the interest of the United States acquired under the act of 1918 in the inland waterways of the country. All rights, both in behalf of the United States and in behalf of the carriers, are preserved under the act of 1918, and the President is authorized to adjust and settle with the railway companies now in his possession and under his control in accordance with the law as prescribed last year.

The advances—and they will be no inconsiderable sum when the railways are returned—made by the United States to the railway companies which are chargeable to capital account are to be funded and payable in five years from the time the railways are so returned, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Other advances which have been made by the Government to railway companies which are not chargeable to capital account, but to the cost of maintenance and operation, are to be evidenced by the demand notes of the railway companies, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent.

Schedules of rates which are filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission within 30 days after the return of the properties to their owners are to become effective at the end of four months, with such modifications and changes as the commission may make in the meantime. During the period of four or five months, as the case may be, the act constitutes a guaranty of an operating income equal, first, with respect to those carriers with which the President has entered into contracts fixing compensation during Federal control of a proportionate amount, representing the proportion of four months or five months, to the annual compensation provided for in that act. With respect to those carriers with which no contracts have been made but whose rights depend upon the act of 1918 alone, and with respect to those carriers dismissed from the control and possession of the Government prior to the 1st of July, 1918, the act constitutes a guaranty of a proportionate operating income as defined by that act. It is commonly known in the literature of the subject as the "standard return."

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question in that connection?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Is the guaranty of which the Senator speaks to be a continuing guaranty for the future?

Mr. CUMMINS. The guaranty ends with the period of four months or five months, as the case may be.

Mr. NELSON. In all cases?

Mr. CUMMINS. Carriers are permitted to file their schedules of rates, if they desire to file them, within 30 days after the act takes effect, and the commission has four months in which to adjust or to modify those rates, according to its view of the justice of the matter. During that time, but no longer, the act constitutes the guaranty which I have attempted to describe. So much of the bill relates to the return of these properties to their owners.

We may now assume for the moment that they have been returned and are in operation by their several owners. The bill declares a permanent policy with respect to our system of regulation and control, operative for all time to come or until Congress shall change the policy which is here declared. Let me offer a preliminary word or two with respect to this subject.

The insuperable difficulty which the Interstate Commerce Commission has always met, and which it has never been able to overcome, in prescribing rates for the carriers of the United States is this: The diversity in the conditions surrounding the carriers, their physical condition, the density of the traffic which they bear, the populations which they serve, and many other considerations of like character have rendered it entirely impossible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe rates that would be at once fair and just to the public and fair and just to the several carriers.

In large measure the rates which produce the revenue of carriers control competitive traffic. Every railroad company which competes for the traffic must charge the same rate or it will secure either all the business or none of the business. The rates which were in force prior to the possession of the railroads by the Government, for instance, would produce for one railroad company an excessive revenue, while they would produce for another railway company, which must compete for the traffic, substantially no net operating income. I have in mind, as I am sure other Senators will have in their minds, many instances in which railway companies were operated under rates which were in force before the Government took possession that yielded to the companies involved 10, 15, even 20 per cent upon the value of their property or upon their capitalization, while with respect to another railway company the same rates would yield either nothing or a very small and inadequate return upon the value of its property. That was the seat of the whole difficulty with the Interstate Commerce Commission. The result was that it either had to prescribe rates that would give to some railway companies an inordinate earning capacity, so that they might sustain the weaker railroads, or give to the stronger railroads rates that would be wholly inadequate to sustain the weaker railways. Both kinds of railways are essential to the business and the commerce of the United States; they must both be sustained if the people of this country are to be served as their commerce and their business demand that they shall be served. This was the difficulty, and the committee has endeavored to meet that difficulty in the following way:

The bill declares that it shall be the policy of the United States to divide or consolidate the railways of the country into not less than 20 and not more than 35 separate, distinct, competitive systems. I emphasize "competitive." It is not suggested that there shall be a regional division of the railways. It is the desire and the purpose of the committee to preserve in this country competition in service in even greater degree than it is now seen.

I may say that upon the roads which I call the stronger roads, or the strong roads, there is carried 70 per cent of the traffic of the United States, and upon the weaker roads, or the weak roads, is carried about 30 per cent of the traffic of the country. It is declared to be the policy of the country that these systems shall be not only competitive but that they shall preserve as far as practicable the existing routes of trade and of commerce and create no disturbance in the movement of commodities from one part of the country to another.

The consolidations of which I have spoken—and I do not intend to enter upon the details of the bill—are to be carried into effect either by the reincorporation of existing State-incorporated railways or the original incorporation of railways under the provisions of this act.

At this point may I say that one of the great causes for distrust, suspicion, and prejudice has been the feeling on the part of the people of the country that the railway carriers of the United States have been and are overcapitalized; that their capitalization represents securities upon which the people ought not to be called upon to pay a return, and one of the vital things which we have attempted to compass is the removal of that distrust in cases in which it is not well founded, and the removal of the overcapitalization in cases in which it is well founded. We have therefore provided that the reincorporated companies—and they are to be reincorporated in much the same way as the national banks of the country were permitted to become national banks during the Civil War—or the companies originally incorporated shall have as a basis for their capitalization the value attached to their properties by the Interstate Commerce Commission and no other value, and when the process of consolidation is complete we will present to this country instead of the disordered spectacle which is now exhibited a picture of railway companies capitalized according to their true worth, representing securities upon which the people of the country can justly be called upon to pay a return.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator to mean that in cases where railway companies are overcapitalized this bill will require them to issue new stock with which to take up the old stock, the issue of new stock to be in lesser quantity than the old stock?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to answer the question, although I did not intend to enter into details. The bill does not attempt to take existing railway companies and change their capitalization unless those companies ask the privilege of consolidating with some other railroad company, and in that case they must accept the basis which is prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We probably have no power to deal in that manner with existing railway companies; but the privilege of consolidation, of which I shall speak in a moment, is conferred only upon reincorporated companies and companies organized under the act originally.

The consolidation of which I have spoken is to take place under and in accordance with a plan to be made immediately after this act takes effect. A plan is to be devised by a board of railway transportation, which is created in the bill, having large and important functions. The plan when tentatively made is to be given publicity and all persons and all corporations interested in the subject are to be given an opportunity to be heard. When the hearing is complete the plan which is recommended by the railway transportation board must receive the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then, aside from the power which is given both the board and the commission to revise from time to time for good cause shown, the plan which has been thus prepared and thus adopted, all consolidations whether voluntary or involuntary are to take place in accordance with, in harmony with, and in furtherance of the plan so promulgated.

Seven years are allotted for a voluntary consolidation—that is, consolidations in harmony with the plan I have suggested—but applied for by either reincorporated companies or original companies to be formed to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The time is suggested by the stage of the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission in valuing the railway properties of the United States, a work which is in progress; we all hope that it will be completed in a much shorter time, but the committee did not feel it could safely assume that it would be entirely done before the expiration of the seven years. During these seven years, as I have suggested, any existing railway company having reincorporated itself under the Federal law which we have prescribed can apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for leave to consolidate, and if the commission finds that the plan of consolidation which it presents is in accordance with the plan adopted by the Government, and is in furtherance of it, it may grant authority for the consolidation. At the end of the period of seven years the consolidation becomes compulsory. That is to say, machinery is created so that the railway transportation board, in connection with the Interstate Commerce Commission, can proceed to consolidate all the railways of the United States into the systems I have described, in so far as they have not already, by voluntary action, been so consolidated.

Again I will not enter into the details, but will simply say that this contemplates no obligation upon the part of the United States. While the power of eminent domain is given both to the railway transportation board and to the companies that may be organized under the act or reincorporated under the act, so that they may also employ the right of eminent domain, there is to be no obligation created, inasmuch as the board is limited in power to those cases in which the financial operations of these companies have already been assured before the consolidation takes place.

We now have, Mr. President, if I have been correctly understood, a fair view of the permanent policy which this bill attempts to establish, and in my judgment—and it is a deliberate, carefully considered judgment—we never will be able successfully to meet all the problems of governmental regulation until these consolidations have taken place; and I further venture the suggestion that unless some such plan as this can be carried into effect Government ownership and Government operation are but a question of time.

As I said a moment ago, we have created a railway transportation board; and in addition to the duty which I have mentioned, of dividing or grouping this country into systems so that the Interstate Commerce Commission can regulate rates in justice to the public and to the carriers, it has many other and extremely important duties.

In a general way we have transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the railway transportation board what may be roughly described as the administrative duties of the commission, leaving the commission mainly—not wholly, but mainly—the duties of rate making, of valuation, and of accounting, but in many important instances requiring the approval of the commission before the act of the board becomes binding. We have transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the board what is ordinarily known as the car-service act, an act introduced a year ago or more by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and which is one of the most important functions which regulation has ever attempted to exercise. We have enlarged it so as to give to the transportation board fair and adequate authority to bring about that unification which is the only merit which Government ownership, as distinguished from private ownership, possesses. We have given it authority to prescribe a common use of terminals and other railway facilities. We have given it power to divert traffic when the public interest requires it to be diverted, in order that the service of transportation may be speedily and adequately carried on. We have transferred to the board the administration of what is known as the safety-appliance act. We have transferred to the board the administration of the locomotive-inspection acts, and many others of similar character. We have attempted to clothe the board with authority over the physical operation of the railroads, hoping to leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission its judicial or semi or quasi judicial duties, unencumbered by the accompaniment of these administrative affairs which have very greatly hindered the commission in the performance of its wider and more far-reaching duties.

I need not enlarge upon that subject further, for I am sure I have given you a general outline of the thing we have attempted to do in this bill respecting a board of railway transportation.

We have required the commission immediately to divide the country into rate groups or districts, and that is one of the most vital things we have attempted to do. In any rate district—and we have done it because the conditions are widely different in the various rate districts——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Are these districts to be differentiated from the classification districts now prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. We have not attempted to limit the commission with regard to these districts, believing that it would act probably more intelligently than the legislature could act, for we have not full information with regard to all the circumstances that should be considered in determining what should constitute a rate group or a rate district. Knowing what has been done in the past, I have entire faith that the Interstate Commerce Commission will discharge this duty with great efficiency, and to the entire satisfaction of the whole American people.

We have required the commission to establish rates in each of these groups or districts that will furnish a fair return upon the value of all the property in that district, considered as a whole. It is the only way in which we can approach, at this time, the principle we have attempted to set forth in the ultimate consolidation of the railway properties. It is the value of the property as fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, mark you, which is to present the basis for the rates in the rate-making group.

For illustration, I will assume that the rate-making groups are the eastern and the western and the southern districts, as they are now known. The rates which are to be imposed upon each district are to be sufficient, and only sufficient, to make a fair return upon the value of the property—railroad property, property held and used for the service of transportation in that district. After that is done, it is apparent to any student of the subject that some of the railroads in the district will earn much more than a fair return, and some of them will earn less than a fair return, for the reasons that I attempted to describe a few moments ago. That situation is inseparable from the condition in which the railroad companies now find themselves, and in which the public, as well, finds itself; but we attempt to reach that disparity in another way.

The earnings of some of the railroads, when the rates are sufficient in the group as a whole to make a fair return upon the value of the property as determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission, will be large. The earnings of some of the railroads will be small; and the latter must struggle as best they can without complete relief until the process of consolidation takes place. I think it is the function of the Government to render transportation service to the people of the United States. It is as completely the function of the Government to supply the people of this country with the facilities with which they move their commodities and move their persons from place to place as it is to furnish the facilities for moving the mails, or any other authority we now exercise without the least protest.

I think it is the duty of the Government to see that adequate transportation is furnished to the people of this country at the lowest possible cost consistent with fairness to the capital which is employed in the business; and if I believed—and I must make this declaration now, because it is a belief that I have held these many years—if I believed that the Government could take and operate the railroads of the United States and furnish the people with the transportation which their commerce demands at less cost than the transportation can be furnished through the instrumentality of private corporations, I would instantly be for Government ownership and Government operation. It is only because I believe and I know, from the experience not only of our own country but of others, from my standpoint, that it will cost the people of this country more for their transportation if its operation be in the hands of the Government than through rigidly regulated private companies, that I am for the latter rather than for the former.

Recalling your attention to the fact that I have said that under the system we have proposed, or, indeed, under any other, until consolidation, the earnings of some companies will be excessive and the earnings of some companies will be inadequate, we have provided that if the return upon the rates so established by the Interstate Commerce Commission and upon the values so ascertained are more than a fair return upon the value of the property of that particular carrier or corporation, the excess shall be paid to the board of transportation, to be expended by that board in the manner which I shall describe: One-half of the excess is to be paid to the board for the advantage of the employees of the corporation which earns an excessive return. One-half of it is to be paid to the board, to be used in the purchase of railway equipment for those railroads which are incapable of securing the capital with which they themselves can buy the equipment, or to loan, for any legitimate railway purpose, to the weaker roads which I have already described.

This leads me to the explanation of the labor provisions in the bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the Senator gets to that subject, he has spoken of the use of the excess; but what does the Senator provide for the case of a particular road where the average rate of fair return upon the group does not afford an adequate return for the particular road?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unfortunately we have not been able to provide any assistance of that kind to the weaker roads, other than the accumulation of this fund coming from one-half of the excess earnings of the stronger road in loans to the weaker road, funds which they may be unable to secure in the general market of the country.

Mr. LENROOT. That leads me to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, we have any constitutional right to deprive a particular road, that may be well managed and well conducted, of an adequate return upon the value of its property?

Mr. CUMMINS. Personally, I have no doubt about that.

Mr. LENROOT. That we have that right?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. That has been a question very much disputed, but it will be remembered that we have provided that the excess shall be over and above a fair return upon the value of its property.

Mr. LENROOT. Not its property, but of all the property of the group, as I read the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has not, I think, comprehended my statement fully. The Interstate Commerce Commission is to establish rates that will make a fair return upon the value of all the property in the group. That, I am sure, the Senator understands. I have said that when these rates were applied the result would be necessarily excessive earnings with some companies and inadequate earnings with others, and we take all the excessive earnings from the strong roads and deposit it in the fund either for the use of the employees of all the railways in the country or for the betterment of the weaker roads.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask whether the inevitable result would not be to force the weaker roads into bankruptcy?

Mr. CUMMINS. The weaker roads are in bankruptcy.

Mr. LENROOT. Some of them are and some are not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know of one that is not. That is the unfortunate part of the situation.

Mr. LENROOT. May I give a concrete illustration? Suppose the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore & Ohio are put into a group. A fair return upon the property of both combined would not furnish an adequate return to the Baltimore & Ohio. The Baltimore & Ohio is not a weak road.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Baltimore & Ohio will not go into bankruptcy; but unless we make very great improvements over the present situation under Government operation I am sorry to say that the Baltimore & Ohio will be in bankruptcy, as well as a great many other roads, because some of the heretofore best roads in the country are not now earning enough to pay the interest upon their bonds.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Wisconsin referred a moment ago to the inadequacy of certain returns or earnings to some of the companies. I simply desire to say in reply, in addition to what was said by the Senator from Iowa, that it is the hope of the committee that many of the smaller roads or roads of little earning capacity will be absorbed by the larger systems, either by a process of voluntary consolidation or compulsory consolidation, and in that way we would relieve very largely the situation which the Senator from Wisconsin has in mind.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Ohio is quite right. That is our ultimate hope, and it is the only hope for the railway situation in my opinion, but the withdrawal of the excessive earnings from some railroads which are fortunately situated will do very much to alleviate the financial hardships which some of the weaker roads are now suffering.

I return and say that this leads me to a brief consideration of the so-called labor provisions of the bill. I need not remind the Senate that this is a somewhat delicate subject, and to it the subcommittee has given its most careful attention, and its conclusions in these respects are the unanimous conclusions of all the members of the subcommittee. I want to emphasize that fact, so that there can be no intimation or suggestion that there is a difference of opinion among the members of the subcommittee with regard to this vital subject.

The first phase of the bill which deals with the subject is the one to which I have just referred, namely, one-half of the excess earnings of the railroads of the country—that is, one-half of all they earn above a fair return upon the value of their individual respective properties as prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission—is paid to the railway transportation board, and it is to be expended in the following way. I intend to take the time to read just how that fund is to be expended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator reaches that will he explain whether it is the intention of the bill to divide this half of the excess earnings with those employees who are already receiving a wage far in excess of the average wage for like character of employment in the United States?

Mr. CUMMINS. The subcommittee have not assumed and do not assume that any employee is receiving an excessive compensation. We have not believed that it was for us or for Congress to legislate upon that particular subject.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. Should not rather the excess profits, instead of being divided among the employees, be so applied as to reflect a reasonableness of rates to the public?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is only a question as to how the excess earnings can be most wisely expended in the interest of the public. The welfare of the people generally is the sole criterion, the guide, and the subcommittee have believed that the public would be better served by the use of the excess earnings in the way I am about to describe.

The share of excess earnings—

I am now quoting from the bill—

Mr. NELSON. At what page?

Mr. CUMMINS. Page 42—

SEC. 25. The share of excess earnings assignable for the benefit of employees as hereinbefore provided shall be put into a fund designated as the employees' welfare fund, under the control and administration of the board. Said fund may be invested or expended for the following purposes, or any of them:

(a) The promotion of invention and research to ameliorate the conditions of labor and to lessen the hazards of employment.
(b) To extend and improve hospital relief
(c) To supplement existing systems of insurance and pensions.
(d) To afford opportunities for the technical education of employees.
(e) To establish a system of profit sharing by employees.

In the administration of said fund it shall be the duty of the board to organize an employees' advisory council composed of one representative from each organized craft of railroad employees requesting representation, and no new line of expenditure from such fund shall be undertaken by the board without first receiving the advice of said council; and, if the advice is not followed in any respect, the reasons therefor shall be stated in writing and published. Full information regarding the expenditures shall be published, and access to the records shall be afforded to the advisory council for the purpose of audit.

This is the first provision in the bill having relation to the welfare of employees of railway corporations.

Second. The bill provides that upon the board of directors of all railway companies, whether organized under the act, reincorporated under the act, or remaining as they are, there shall be two directors representing the classified employees of the corporation involved; but I may say, in passing, also two directors representing the Government and appointed by the board.

It is also provided that upon all committees of boards of directors having power to act, such as executive committees or finance committees, there shall be at least one director who was chosen in the manner provided in the bill for the election or appointment as a member of the board of directors from the classified employees. That is the second provision made for labor. It is in accordance with a universal and, as I believe, a just movement in this country and in every other to give the employees of any industry an opportunity to know the policies, the reasons which move the corporations in any given direction. I feel sure that time will but verify my prediction when I say that it will not be long until all industries are organized in that way. I repeat, it is my opinion that this is one of the conditions precedent to peaceful, intelligent, and forward-looking policies in the controversies between capital and labor.

Third. We have created in the bill a Government tribunal for the settlement of all disputes between the employees of railway companies and the companies themselves, including the fixing of wages and the conditions of labor. This is obviously an advance upon the general course of legislation in the past. I confess that I have been rather slow and somewhat reluctant to reach the conclusion that it was necessary that the Government shall fix the wages ultimately of railway employees, but I have been driven to that conclusion by the inexorable logic of events. There is no possible way of withstanding it. If transportation is a governmental function or allied to governmental functions, it is impossible to contemplate continued and disturbing controversies between railway companies and employees. I want the Senate and the country to know what provisions we have made in that regard. They will be found on page 43 of the print which some Senators have before them, as follows:

SEC. 26. For the purpose of settling disputes not adjusted under existing provisions of law or otherwise adjusted between railroads and their employees there is hereby created a committee of wages and working conditions, composed of eight members, four of whom shall represent labor and four of whom shall represent railroad corporations. They shall be appointed for terms of four years: Provided, That the terms of the first four appointees in each group shall be one, two, three, and four years, respectively. Each organized railroad craft may nominate candidates for the memberships representing labor, and the board shall appoint four persons from among such nominees. Each railroad corporation may nominate one candidate for the memberships representing the carriers, and the board shall appoint four persons from among such nominees. If less than four nominations in either group are made, the board may appoint additional persons believed to represent labor or the carriers, as the case may be. The members of the committee of wages and working conditions shall each receive a salary of $4,000 per annum. They may appoint a secretary and other necessary employees. The board shall provide a suitable meeting place for the committee of wages and working conditions, and shall pay out of its appropriation the salaries of the members and of the secretary and other employees of the said committee, and all other expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of the said committee. The salaries of the employees of the said committee shall be fixed by the commission.

I quote further:

It shall be the duty of the committee of wages and working conditions to consider all complaints submitted by representatives of employees or of the carriers and to make decisions by majority vote as promptly as practicable. The decisions of said committee shall be certified to the board and shall take effect when approved by the board.

If the committee of wages and working conditions is evenly divided upon any question, the matter in dispute, together with all records of proceedings pertaining thereto, shall be referred to the board, whose decision shall be final. The board shall certify to the commission all decisions of the committee of wages and working conditions when approved by said board and all decisions by said board in cases referred to it promptly upon deciding the same, and said certificate shall be conclusive evidence before the commission of the matters so determined and certified.

This is the tribunal for governmentally adjudging and decreeing the merits with regard to all controversies between the employees of railway companies and the corporations themselves. It is the intention of the subcommittee that this decision, when finally reached, shall be conclusive everywhere, not only with regard to the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission but it shall be conclusive upon every citizen who desires to be a law-abiding man.

The subcommittee have assumed that it was necessary to give to the board which we propose to create some rules of conduct that it can apply when it comes to adjust or settle or decide upon a controversy between the operating men and the corporation. I quote further:

SEC. 27. The wages and salaries paid by carriers subject to this act and the hours of labor and other conditions of employment shall be fair, just, and reasonable. In determining the fairness, justness, and reasonableness of wages and salaries the committee of wages and working conditions and the board shall take into consideration among other relevant circumstances:

(a) The scale of wages paid for similar kinds of work in other industries;
(b) The relation between wages and the cost of living;
(c) The hazards of the employment;
(d) The training and skill required;
(e) The degree of responsibility; and
(f) The character and regularity of the employment.

These are rules that are suggested for the committee of wages and working conditions and to the board in deciding these disputes as they arise from time to time. There are adequate provisions in regard to the summoning of witnesses and requiring books and papers and all the information necessary to enable the board to decide the matter with full knowledge and all the information that it can acquire.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senate misunderstood the Senator from Iowa; at least I did. I do not think the Senator meant to be understood that this was a bill creating a board to fix all the wages of railroad employees by law.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. KELLOGG. It is a board created to settle all disputes——

Mr. CUMMINS. It has jurisdiction only when a dispute arises which is incapable of being settled or adjusted by the other provisions of the law which are now in existence.

Mr. KELLOGG. Between the employees and the companies themselves. It only acts in the settlement of a dispute between employees and employer.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota is quite right about that. Then comes this provision:

SEC. 29. Any carrier or any officer of any carrier knowingly refusing to obey the decision of said committee after it has been approved by the board or of the board in cases referred to it, as hereinabove provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

That is intended, of course, to punish those officers of railway companies who may refuse to give heed or to obey or to carry into effect decisions of the committee or of the board.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know how far the Senator from Iowa invites questions, for he has stated that he does not care to go into minute details.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to answer any question.

Mr. NORRIS. If my question has a tendency to lead the Senator further than he would like, if he will say so, I will, of course, withdraw it. But what he has just said about this board has led me to ask this question, without having had an opportunity, of course, to examine the bill until just a few moments ago. The answer may be very simple, but to me it presents a practical proposition which I think may lead into difficulties. Assuming that one of the railroad companies making excessive earnings has a dispute with its employees as to wages, if the officials of the corporation and the employees agree on what the wages shall be then this committee has nothing to do with the matter; that is final. Under those conditions, would it not be probable, since the corporation could retain only so much money anyway, but would earn more than the amount allowed them under ordinary conditions, that they could make an agreement with their employees that would be unfair to the public, either concerning wages or working conditions, and thus compel the public to stand burdens that would not be fair? In other words, there would be no limit as to what they might do; and under those conditions, it seems to me, there would be nothing to impel any interest on their part except to come within the earnings, which, the Senator says, in the case of some roads would be very excessive.

Mr. CUMMINS. While neither the board nor the committee on wages and conditions of labor would have any jurisdiction in such a case, it is not true, I hope, that the public would be unprotected, for the Interstate Commerce Commission would then have the right to review what had been done between the employees and the carrier corporation, and if the Interstate Commerce Commission believed that there had been any such alliance as that described by the Senator from Nebraska, it would make the necessary order to protect the public in deciding what was a fair return upon the value of the property of the carrier.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the bill give to the Interstate Commerce Commission such appellate jurisdiction?

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not do so expressly, but as a necessary consequence the commission would have that power just exactly as it has it now. The commission is not obliged in fixing rates to accept the wages which have been agreed upon between carriers and their employees.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the finding of this committee is not final, but can be reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Where there is a dispute it can then be reviewed by the board, and the board, acting for the Government, may disapprove the decision of the committee on wages and working conditions.

Mr. NORRIS. My last question probably did not state just what I intended it should. In case there is no dispute—and that is the case I originally put—will the Interstate Commerce Commission have power to review when both sides are satisfied with the decision?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it has such power now. That particular thought has not been considered by the committee; and if the bill is lacking in that respect I hope it will be amended, for the Senator from Nebraska has stated a case which must have some kind of remedy; that is apparent.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It appears to me that the condition which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] apprehends—namely, an agreement between the representatives of the company and the representatives of the employees—now exists. It is perfectly feasible under present conditions for the companies and their employees to agree about wages. So there is at least no new situation created by the bill in that regard.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will yield to me I desire to say, in answer to the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], or in further partial answer to his question, and also in pursuance of the suggestion made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], who has just taken his seat, that the bill which the subcommittee proposes does place a limitation upon the power of the railroads and their employees to make contracts. Section 27 provides that—

> The wages and salaries paid by carriers subject to this act and the hours of labor and other conditions of employment shall be fair, just, and reasonable.

While the existing law does not prevent any contract that might be entered into between employees and the railroads, this bill does safeguard the interests of the public against the possibility by improvident contracts such as have been suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. Under the provisions of section 27, if a railroad company should agree, for instance, to pay its employees twice the compensation which should be applied, taking into consideration the facts set forth in the bill as the basis for determining what constitutes a fair, just, and reasonable wage, a complaint to the Interstate Commerce Commission that that agreement was unfair, unjust, and unreasonable would enable the commission to determine the question, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, under the present rules of procedure before the commission. The matter could be reached in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I desire to say that I was impressed with what the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said, that conditions would be the same as they now are. Of course, I am not familiar with its details, but as I understand the bill from the explanation made by the Senator from Iowa, there would be a great many instances in the case of the strong roads where the earnings would be excessive, and it was that kind of a case I had in mind when I propounded my question. In such a case the officials of the railroad would not be moved by any question of profit, for the company would not get that profit anyway, while under present conditions, if they make an agreement with their employees that is unreasonable it immediately has an effect upon their own incomes. I do not know whether the particular provision which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has read would give the Interstate Commerce Commission jurisdiction, but the simple statement in the law that all these rules and regulations, wages, and provisions should be fair and just would be too general.

Mr. CUMMINS. It may be, Mr. President, that some additional strength should be given to that provision, although I agree entirely with the Senator from Arkansas that the commission would have complete power in that respect.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, to make the matter absolutely clear, will the Senator allow me to give him a concrete case and base his answer upon that case?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose that one of the more fortunate roads should be allowed by the commission to earn 10 per cent upon rates which would be fixed by the commission and which would be applicable throughout the district, and that their earnings were really 20 per cent. Now, suppose that they anticipated its division with their employees and stated, "We will take 5 per cent of this now and pay you 5 per cent more than the other roads can afford to pay." There would be, then, no dispute between the railroad company and its employees, and yet their wages would be considerably higher than the wages of other employees, while the public would not be paying any less. Under the bill, who could make a complaint to bring that matter before the commission and secure a revision which would force the company to pay the usual wages?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, anyone who is interested in transportation. The railway board of transportation could do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Could anyone who does lose by it institute such a complaint?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Such a complainant is only paying the regular rates that are fixed, and he can not say that he is losing anything by it. The only ones who are losing are the unfortunate roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. They could complain; any shipper could complain, and anyone else who has the right to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the act to regulate commerce could complain.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me to revert just for a moment to the question asked by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I did not follow very clearly—in fact, could not hear very distinctly—the suggestions of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]; but the last part of section 26 of the proposed act provides as follows:

> The board shall certify to the commission all decisions of the committee of wages and working conditions when approved by the board.

My understanding of that language is that the words "when approved by the board" give the board, which represents the public, discretion of approving or disapproving the findings of the committee of wages and working conditions.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska, however, was speaking of a case that had never been before the committee on wages and working conditions, and therefore never before the board.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood that he was speaking of a case where the committee on wages and working conditions had agreed.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. My statement was directed to the inquiry of the Senator from Nebraska, which stated a hypothetical case, the case of a railroad having excess earnings, in which event, as he stated, there might be a tendency to collude with the employees to pay the employees excessive compensation and thus absorb the excess earnings and prevent them from going into the fund contemplated by this bill. I stated that, since the pending bill provides that the wages paid employees shall be just, fair, and reasonable, such a case could be reached by complaint filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission setting forth the facts, in which event the commission could make such a ruling as would in all probability obviate the difficulty. The probability of such a case arising is exceedingly remote, it seems to me, but it might possibly occur.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interject a word just there?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understood the Senator from Iowa, earlier in his explanation he stated that the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission was going to be changed, and while they would have jurisdiction of rates and some other matters, the question of wages, perhaps, would not be one of the matters in their jurisdiction. In the case that I have put, if such a thing occurred, it would not affect the rates, and if it did not affect the rates, the Interstate Commerce Commission, perhaps, if the bill takes away some of their authority at least, would not have jurisdiction.

Mr. CUMMINS. None of the authority of the commission with respect to that is taken away; on the contrary, we have given them express addditional authority upon that point in this——

Mr. NORRIS. If you have, then you have remedied it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Interstate Commerce Commission is to prescribe in the case of a carrier what is a fair and just return upon its particular property. If a particular carrier has colluded with its employees and is paying them more than a fair, just, and reasonable compensation, then the amount paid to the employees under that sort of an arrangement would not be deducted in determining what the excess earnings were.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the matter to which I wished to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa, and also the attention of the Senator from Arkansas, was that in the particular case I have put it would not have an effect, as I understand the bill from the Senator's explanation, upon the rates. The rates apply to a whole division——

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but——

Mr. NORRIS. And some road in a given division has excessive earnings. The action of the railroad company in the case I have put would simply have a tendency to take away excess profits; that is all.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator does not quite catch my meaning. Suppose the carrier were in receipt of $100,000 of excess earnings according to its own books. Now, suppose the carrier had conspired with its employees and had paid out $100,000 in wages more than was fair and reasonable. Then the excess earnings of that carrier would be $200,000 and the stockholders would have to bear the loss. It is not very likely that the carrier would undertake any such experiment as that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think the Senator understands my position in the matter. The stockholders would not have anything to do about it. These are excess earnings that are going into this fund; but the stockholders in the case I have put are getting all they can get, and more is being accumulated to go into this fund, so that the stockholders would have no interest in it whatever.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska is wrong about that so far as authority is concerned. The Interstate Commerce Commission would simply take the excess payment to the employees and put it into this fund; that is all; and the stockholders would receive that much less.

Mr. NORRIS. The stockholders, as I understand the Senator's explanation, would not get this excess fund; it is a fund that is paid over to this board, one-half of it to be used in one way and one-half in another way.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the commission should say "You have been in the habit of paying 7 per cent dividends, but now you are paying too much to your employees, and we will only allow you to pay 4 per cent dividends"?

Mr. NORRIS. No; but suppose you are paying a 25 per cent dividend, and it is held that 10 per cent is fair and reasonable, and that 15 per cent of that dividend is going into this fund, and under those conditions you make that kind of a deal with your employees—then where are you?

Mr. CUMMINS. Then we will reduce it in just the same way. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will give thought to the matter, and if he has any amendments to propose when the bill finally comes in, if it ever does come in, from the full committee, I am sure that every consideration will be given to his suggestions, because I am just as anxious to protect the public against any such contingency as the Senator from Nebraska can possibly be.

I resume for just a moment more the provisions of the bill with regard to labor. I had already read the provision with regard to the disobedience of any officer of any carrier. That section concludes in this way:

> If two or more persons enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce; or enter into any combination or agreement which substantially hinders, restrains, or prevents the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, such persons so combining and agreeing shall be deemed guilty of a conspiracy and shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing herein shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

Mr. President, the latter part of this section makes it unlawful for any two or more persons to combine substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or to enter into any combination that accomplishes this result. Everyone understands and will understand perfectly, I am sure, that this is a prohibition against what is ordinarily known as the lockout, and is also a prohibition against what is ordinarily known as the strike. It is intended to preserve the channels of commerce free from obstructions of that character.

The committee believes that after having provided a tribunal for the adjustment of disputes between railroad companies and their employees, both sides must accept the judgment of that tribunal and respect it. It is not intended, of course, to lay the least restraint upon any individual so far as the cessation of his employment is concerned; but it is intended to prevent the combinations which result in a general suspension of transportation. We have reached that stage of development and civilization in our country in which the lives and welfare and the health of all the people of the country depend upon the continuous, the constant, and the regular interchange of commodities between communities and persons. Only two or three weeks, in many populations, lie between plenty and starvation. Only two or three weeks, in certain seasons of the year, lie between warmth and freezing. All the considerations of modern life depend upon and they demand that the transportation of this country shall be carried on free from obstruction of that character.

I have always regarded the strike as a legitimate and an invaluable weapon as between the employer and the employee. I have looked upon it as substantially the only weapon that could be employed by the laboring man in order to secure that justice which is his due. But when we advance to the point at which the Government undertakes to fix his wages in the event of dispute, when we advance to the point where we authorize a Government tribunal to enter a decree with regard to the justice of the particular matter, there is no room longer for the interruption of a strike or a combination among men of any kind, whether employers or employees, to hinder, delay, or restrain the movement of commerce.

I believe this provision will result in justice to the employee. I believe it will secure for him in an enlightened Government a fair share of the fruits of his toil; and, so believing, I have given it and I do give it my unqualified support.

Mr. President, a word more and I shall have concluded.

We have given the commission in this bill the exclusive authority over what may be known as the issues of securities by railway companies. We have greatly enlarged the car-service act, to which I have referred, so that the utmost capacity of the railways of the country can be utilized in the days of need. We have made many other amendments to the interstate-commerce act. I ought to say—it is only fair to say—that we have taken the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], which contains many amendments of the act to regulate commerce, and, with some modifications, have embraced those amendments in the bill.

I beg pardon for having delayed the Senate so long, but we are dealing with a subject of such vast importance and of such imminence that I felt that this explanation of the work of the subcommittee might be helpful; and I know that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and possibly other members of the subcommittee, will be glad to supplement what I have so inadequately said by some observations of their own.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I shall take occasion at this time to present to the Senate briefly only one feature of the bill which has been introduced this morning by the Senator from Iowa, and which was prepared by the subcommittee of which he has spoken, providing for the return of the railroads to their owners and the operation of the railroads under private management.

The feature of the bill that I address myself now in explanation of is that last discussed by the Senator from Iowa. It is exceedingly desirable, in view of the importance of this provision of the bill, that it should be made clear to the Senate and to the country at this time. The Senator from Iowa has explained the subject and I might very well rest the case on his statement.

There is no purpose on the part of the subcommittee to oppress anyone. Current and recent events have given emphasis to the fact that it is impossible for the Congress to perform the constitutional function of regulating commerce unless some tribunal is established by the Government empowered finally to decide disputes between railroads and their employees—disputes which might result in a suspension of commerce and in the misery and suffering which we all realize would result from a universal or general lockout or strike. Believing that the time has come when the Congress should act promptly and courageously in considering and disposing of this all-important question, your subcommittee has written into the bill providing for the return of the railroads to their owners some paragraphs which create a Government tribunal authorized to determine disputes between railroads and their employees relating to hours, wages, and working conditions. That tribunal is called the committee of wages and working conditions, and is composed of four members representative of labor and four members representative of the railroad organizations. Nominations for each class are made by those authorized to represent the classes, and the selections are made by the transportation board from the nominees of labor and from the nominees of the railroads, respectively. The decisions of this committee are by majority, and since it is composed of four representatives of the employees and four representatives of the employers it is easily conceiveable that in a given case the committee might be evenly divided, in which event the bill provides that the whole case shall be referred to the transportation board, and by it decided. Decisions of the committee of wages and working conditions are made effective when approved by the board. The committee thought it wise and just to retain some governmental regulation over settlements of this character, in view of the fact that the public finally pays the bill. When decisions have been reached by the committee and approved by the board, or in case of failure of the committee to decide and decision by the board, these decisions are certified to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and are made conclusive upon that body in the determination of all questions which may arise before it.

In this bill we provide for representation on the boards of directors of the various companies of two members representing labor and two members representing the public. It is also provided, as stated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], that the country shall be divided into rate-making groups, and rates shall be so adjusted as to provide a fair return upon the value of the property held and used for transportation in each group. This will undoubtedly result in some railroads, the more profitable railroads, receiving earnings in excess of a fair return. The bill provides that the commission shall determine what is a fair return, and, having determined that, all sums above a fair return shall be divided into two funds: First, a fund to be known as the employees' welfare fund, to be devoted to the improvement of the conditions of labor, to promote inventions and to lessen the hazards of employment, to the extension and improvement of hospital relief, to supplementing existing systems of pensions and insurance, to afford opportunities for technical education, and, if the commission so decides, to providing for a system of profit sharing by the employees. The other half, the bill provides at page 8—

> Shall be deposited in a fund which, from time to time, shall be expended by the board in the purchase of equipment to be leased under proper terms to carriers in order to facilitate transportation or to loan to carriers upon reasonable security in order to purchase equipment or other facilities in the event that such carriers are unable to secure elsewhere the funds with which to provide themselves with adequate transportation facilities.

The right to strike has heretofore been recognized in our laws, particularly in certain provisions of the Clayton Act. Those laws should be modified and strikes of employees on railroads engaged in interstate commerce should be forbidden.

The provision by law of a fair tribunal to settle disputes between railroads and their employees is, of course, a prerequisite in any plan fairly calculated to relieve the country from the menace of strikes and lockouts that will restrain or prevent interstate commerce. It is indispensable to the comfort and life of our people that commerce be continued and no system which leaves commerce subject to the will of individuals or organizations among them can be justified.

In the interests of the laborers themselves, and more particularly in the interests of the general public, Congress should deal with this subject comprehensively and courageously.

It is desirable, if possible, to devise a plan that will meet with the approval of the laborers and at the same time fairly safeguard the public interest. But it might as well be understood in the beginning that the question is one in which the public interest is equal to that of the railroads and the laborers, if not controlling, and that under our system of government, while no man should be compelled to perform involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, and while the full freedom and right of employees as individuals to quit work at will must be preserved, the dangers of a general strike or lockout which would suspend commerce are so apparent and far-reaching that disputes likely to result in strikes or lockouts on railroads must be determined in an orderly manner.

If a just solution of the subject can be written into the law, the value of the service to the public will be almost immeasurable. In the years to come frequent controversies will arise between the railroads and their employees, no matter what general plan is adopted for the disposition of the railroads. Whether, as contemplated by this bill, the roads are returned to their owners and hereafter privately operated under strict Government regulations or the Government acquires and operates them, there will be no escaping serious controversies affecting the rights and compensation of laborers on railroads. It is necessary that the public should maintain a check upon the decisions of such questions, for to permit railroads and their employees the unqualified power of decision might impose unreasonable burdens upon the public generally. The important thing to be accomplished is to provide a fair tribunal for the early and just decision of labor disputes as to the railroads, and, having done that, no logical reason appears for countenancing either strikes or lockouts calculated to suspend commerce. Everyone realizes that commerce is not only necessary but also indispensable to provide comfort for our people and to maintain their lives.

This bill not only assures to employees just, fair, and reasonable hours, wages, and working conditions, but, as already stated, it gives them representation on the boards of directors of the various railroad corporations and establishes an employees' welfare fund from the excess earnings which it is believed some of the railroads will derive from the rates to be established under the bill. This employees' welfare fund will be expended by the transportation board, upon the recommendation of an advisory committee representing the railroad brotherhoods, and is designed to promote hospital relief, improve conditions of labor, lessen the hazards of employment, supplement existing systems of insurance and pensions, afford opportunities for the technical education of employees, and to establish a system of profit sharing by them.

There is no purpose to oppress or permit the oppression of the employees of railroads. On the contrary, the bill is intended to secure to them their just rights. Having done this, it can not be considered unfair to protect the public against the dangers of strikes and lockouts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The bill introduced by the Senator from Iowa will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harrison	McKellar	Sheppard
Bankhead	Henderson	McNary	Shields
Borah	Johnson, Calif.	Moses	Smith, Ariz.
Brandegee	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sterling
Colt	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Kendrick	Nugent	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Overman	Wadsworth
Dial	Keyes	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	King	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Kirby	Pittman	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Poindexter	Watson
Gronna	Lodge	Pomerene	Williams
Hale	McCormick	Ransdell	Wolcott
Harris	McCumber	Robinson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to submit a report.

REPORT OF DAUGHTERS OF AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S. Res. 175), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

> Resolved, That the report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended March 1, 1918, transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, pursuant to law, be printed as a Senate document, with illustrations.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator yield to me for just one moment that I may make a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator kindly state his purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a request for unanimous consent to insert something in the RECORD.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the nature of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is an editorial in the Baltimore Sun entitled, "Facts and Fancies About the League of Nations."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield for that purpose.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"FACTS AND FANCIES ABOUT THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"The meeting at the Lyric on Thursday night in opposition to the league of nations was a most successful one from the standpoint of its promoters. There was a big crowd and great enthusiasm. The speakers were all adepts in the art of arousing the emotions of an audience and the applause which their periods commanded was abundant and spontaneous. It was evident that the particular 3,000 people present at the Lyric were largely opposed to the league of nations and that the speakers were saying the things which they wanted them to say. It is true that the audience was largely a Republican audience. Of the 'prominent Baltimoreans' present, practically all were Republicans. There was a sprinkling of colored brethren in the gallery. Much of the most vociferous applause was given to remarks made in disparagement of President Wilson. But it would be a very unfortunate thing if the Republicans of the country, through dislike of President Wilson or for any other reason unconnected with the merits or demerits of the league of nations, should allow themselves to assume a position of hostility to the league. It would be very unfortunate if they, through thoughtlessness or prejudice, should ally themselves with Johnson and Borah rather than with Taft and Hughes and Root. This, as the several speakers of the evening all truly said, is not a partisan question and should not be considered in a partisan spirit. The treaty that is finally ratified should express the sentiment of America and not of a party.

"In view of this fact it is desirable that Republicans as well as Democrats and all other citizens should forget their partisanship and should form their opinion as to the desirability or undesirability of the league of nations purely from a consideration of what it is and what will be the effects of it. To that end it would be appropriate to discuss quietly and rationally the arguments against the covenant presented by the speakers of Thursday evening.

"One thing which underlies practically all the argument and which is vital to any understanding of it is the fact that no one holds either the peace treaty or the league covenant to be perfect documents. No one believes that either will bring about the millennium overnight. What the advocates of the treaty do hold is that it marks a tremendous advance over any other similar treaty in the world's history and a great step forward in international relations. It has many beneficent provisions—provisions that could never have been incorporated in it but for the idealism injected into it by American pressure, that idealism which is the target for so much scorn of such 'practical' men as Senator REED. It makes free and independent nations of hitherto oppressed peoples—the Poles, the Czecho-Slovaks, the Jugo-Slavs. It makes colonial governments responsible to a tribunal composed of representatives of all the civilized nations of the world. It points the way to a reduction of armaments. It, of course, puts an end to the German menace—a menace the frightfulness of which some of our people seem to be beginning to forget—and it presents a rational plan, a plausible plan, and a plan which represents the best thought of the best minds on the earth, which have devoted themselves to the subject, to make a repetition of that menace as impossible as human thought and concerted action can make it. All of these advantages will be lost if the treaty fails.

"The opponents of the treaty say that these advantages are apparent only, and not real. An independent Poland, an independent Czechoslovakia, and independent Jugo-Slavia have, indeed, been created, but they will be controlled by the international bankers or the military cliques of Europe. The colonizing governments will still control the backward peoples. Armaments will not be effectively and fairly reduced. The league of nations will not work. Here it is clear that they have fallen into the error of which we spoke above. Because the new arrangements are not perfect, they are overlooking the fact that they are tremendously better than the arrangements of the past. They do not accomplish everything. They do accomplish much.

"Senator JOHNSON devoted much of his attention to the subject of the secret treaties. Here his rhetorical exuberance betrayed him into an erroneous statement, when he said that the peace was based upon the secret treaties and upon them alone. It was not based upon them alone. But that is inconsequential. The secret treaties are bad. The system is bad, and some of the provisions of these particular treaties are bad. The provisions of the secret treaties, or some of them, were insisted upon by the nations participating in them, and were incorporated in the peace treaty. What the critics overlook, however, is the fact that international relationships in Europe heretofore have always been based upon secret treaties. European diplomacy knew no other method. When Italy and Japan entered the war they merely followed the invariable precedent of the past by agreeing in advance upon an after-the-war program, upon a division of the spoils of war, to put it coarsely. It was known that in the event of victory Germany's colonies would be taken from her. It was natural and inevitable that England and France and Japan should agree in advance as to which of the colonies should go to which.

"A bad system? Certainly, when viewed from the standpoint of perfection. But one the existence of which had to be accepted, because it did exist. Sensible men who accept conditions as they find them could not do otherwise than premise their actions upon the existing conditions. To reject a peace which in its entirety is highly desirable, a peace which in itself will bar all secret treaties in the future if the peoples of the nations consenting to it insist upon the carrying out of its plain provisions, merely because it is based in part upon secret treaties of the past, would be utterly illogical.

"This leads to another point. Senator JOHNSON objected to the treaty because it was made not by the peoples of the nations which fought Germany but by their rulers. This is partly true and partly untrue. The attitude of the peoples of the various nations, of course, largely dictated the position of their representatives at Paris. So far as the European nations are concerned, at least, those representatives could not have remained in power but for the approval of their peoples. But this important fact is to be remembered in connection with the future. The league of nations will be what the peoples of the nations composing it make it. In practically every nation of the world the people are assuming larger powers in the control of the governments. In practically every one the political issue is no longer between the old-time liberals and conservatives; it is between the liberals and the radicals. And both of those classes are interested in making the league of nations a workable instrument, responsive to the will of the people. That is one of the chief grounds of the reasonable hope that it will prove an effective agency for the preservation of peace.

"Senator JOHNSON is particularly concerned about article 10. If he had his way, he said, he would shut up every American in a room for 24 hours and make him learn article 10 by heart. We, too, should like to have that provision universally known, and to further the good work we print it here verbatim:

"'The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.'

"The Senator is anxious that everyone should read this article, but it is apparent that he himself has not read it understandingly. How else can be explained his impassioned assertion to his audience that 'you are asked to guarantee with your blood' that these territorial arrangements shall stand for all time, and his even more absurd statement that 'we are asked to guarantee the possession of Shantung by Japan for all time.' Apparently his eyes are blind to those words, 'as against external aggression.' That means merely that Germany shall not take possession of Alsace-Lorraine against the will of the people of Alsace-Lorraine, that Japan shall not hold Shantung against the will of the people of Shantung. It does not protect any nation against internal disturbance, against revolution or rebellion. And, in any case, the council of the league has authority only to advise, not to compel. Congress can accept its advice or reject it. It will of course be under a moral obligation to use the power of this country to carry into effect the plain intention of this article. But the hypothetical cases advanced by the opponents of the league to disparage it are usually cases which do not involve the carrying out of the intention of the article. Congress would be under no obligation, moral or otherwise, to accept the advice of the council if it should ever attempt to involve this country in any unwarranted action.

"'We want to say for ourselves when we shall go to war,' cried Senator JOHNSON. We shall, under the league and under the Constitution. 'What one man is wise enough to sit in that council at Geneva and declare war for 100,000,000 people?' he asked. No one man will do it. Congress alone will declare war. The representative of the United States on the council will pretty nearly represent the sentiment of the people of the United States. In the inconceivable event that he doesn't, Congress will disregard his action. And Congress will control.

"Senator REED is against not only this league of nations but any one that might be devised, because it attempts the impossible. He made the startlingly original suggestion that you can not change human nature. 'If Christ's Sermon on the Mount could not change the spirit of the robber nations of the earth in 2,000 years, no league of nations could.' This human-nature argument was probably used by a prototype of Senator REED in some savage tribe of precivilized days when the suggestion was made that it would be better for him to settle his differences with his neighbor by appealing to the judgment of his chief rather than by fighting it out. It was probably made by those who opposed the formation of courts of law of any sort. Perhaps you can't change human nature, but you can appeal to human nature. You can teach men that it is wiser to settle their disputes by legal methods than by violence. If individuals can be so taught, nations can. Maryland and Pennsylvania know that. The United States and Canada know it. This country and Great Britain have learned it. Is it preposterous, in this day when Europe is closer to America in most essential respects than Maryland was to Ohio before the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was built, to think about and work for an extension of the principle?

"Times have changed. Senator JOHNSON argues not, for he declared that there have been no alterations in international relations sufficient to justify any change in America's traditional policy of isolation. The great war is the answer to that. The fact is that participation in the affairs of the international world has been thrust upon this country, whether we will or no. We can not avoid it any more than we could avoid participation in the war, or any more than we will be able to avoid participation in another war of the sort if it should come. The men who are vainly crying out for a policy of isolation are talking of a dead past. Much more than half a league behind, they are pursuing an accomplished fact with flouts and flings. The only question for America to decide to-day is as to how it shall participate in international affairs, whether in the most effective or a less effective way.

"The racial equality talk of Senator REED is hardly worthy of discussion. That black and yellow races should be included in the league is, of course, desirable. That they may constitute a majority of the members of the assembly is unimportant. The important work of the league is to be done by the council and not by the assembly. Senator REED sees in this fact an admission that the assembly is a 'fake' institution and without value. That is not true. It is necessary to have a general body in which all the nations represented in the league should have a voice, in order that no cause in which a single one of these nations might be interested should lack a champion. For that reason it was right that the various self-governing bodies of the British Empire should have representation in the assembly. That is all there is to the talk of Great Britain's having 6 votes in the assembly to America's 1. In the council, which is the important body, the United States has an equal vote with the British Empire, with France and Italy and Japan.

"In the foregoing we think we have stated fully and fairly and very frankly the principal arguments of these opponents of the league of nations. We have resisted the temptation to point out the evidences of personal and political partisanship and unfairness, which were not wanting in their speeches, because this article is intended to appeal to the sober-minded judgment of both Republicans and Democrats who want to know the truth about this matter and are impatient of partisanship or unfairness on either side. But there is one feature of the method used by these men in appealing to the American people that ought to be pointed out very plainly and frankly. That is their impudent—we can think of no other word that correctly describes it—their impudent assumption that there is more patriotism and Americanism linked up with their cause than with that of the men who favor the league; that they are more patriotic and more American than Mr. Taft and Mr. Hughes and Mr. Wilson. Patriotism means faithfulness to the institutions and ideals of one's country. Among the American ideals are liberty and freedom and peaceful relations with the rest of the earth, and the very purpose of the league of nations is to uphold and strengthen these institutions in the earth. The men who are seeking to establish it are engaged in an endeavor of purest patriotism and Americanism, and would be even if they were mistaken.

"In the dark days of the spring of 1918 when the hordes of the enemy were driving relentlessly toward Paris, when it seemed as if the French capital must fall, and with it, perhaps, civilization itself, the people of this country knew what the German menace was and they knew what war was. And in the minds of most Americans, we believe, there was registered at that time a vow that if this calamity came not upon the earth, if the heroic efforts of the American men on that horrible fighting line were successful and civilization was saved, they would do, each of them in his power, whatever they could do to prevent a like menace from ever again frightening the world. The question now is as to whether that vow is to be respected. The league of nations represents an effort to carry it into effect, the only effort possible. If it is not formed, nothing will now be done to make peace durable and wars improbable. If it is not formed, there will be no compensation for the war and the bloodshed therein. This is the issue."

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from New Jersey will allow me just a moment, I wish to say in connection with the editorial that I consider it a complete answer to the argument made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the argument made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, last Saturday the Attorney General of the United States sent broadcast throughout the country an attack upon me. I have only seen the newspaper accounts, but I am informed that Mr. Palmer's statement is the same everywhere, and that the attack was published in all papers throughout the country.

On Sunday, purchasing a paper in New Brunswick, I saw the great headline:

Palmer charges FRELINGHUYSEN with aiding Germans during the war.

Another paper had the headline:

Palmer bitterly attacks FRELINGHUYSEN, charging him with misuse of his office.

Mr. Palmer tries to give the impression that in my opposition to his appointment and in Senator CALDER'S and my effort to have his acts as Alien Property Custodian investigated we are "pleasing Germany"; that I was opposed to the trading-with-the-enemy act; also that I was against the Americanization of the German industrial concerns in America; that I urged the continuance of the German insurance companies in this country as such; that I protested against his official management of the German woolen mills in Passaic, and that the position taken by the Stuyvesant Insurance Co., of which I am president, in refusing to cancel the liability in the Balkan Insurance Co. under a contract was an evidence of pro-Germanism.

Such charges are so ridiculous that they scarcely warrant a reply.

The people of my State know my record for patriotism and loyalty, and I feel sure, and I feel that I can safely assert, that they will resent such an outrageous charge of this character against me.

Mr. Palmer is pursuing the same course he has used before, shouting pro-Germanism against those who oppose his high-handed methods, and through his great sources of publicity in his department, maintained at the expense of the taxpayers, seeking to intimidate those who stand for upright practices.

Mr. Palmer charges that I introduced Mr. Neal Bassett, vice president of the Fireman's Insurance Co., of Newark, and of the American Insurance Co., of Newark, to the committee considering the trading-with-the-enemy act, and that together we urged an amendment in the interests of certain American insurance companies contrary to the provisions proposed in the act by Mr. Palmer. That is true.

Under the act the assets of the German companies having contracts for reinsurance with American companies came into the hands of the Alien Property Custodian.

The original draft of the act provided that the American insurance companies having claims for losses should proceed through the courts to collect such claims from the German companies in the custody of the Alien Property Custodian.

To compel the American companies to finance their own losses as well as the German losses, compelling them also to sell securities on a depressed market when their surpluses were low, was unfair and unwise and would have resulted in crippling some and ruining others of the 17 American companies that had contracts with these German institutions prior to the war, and which had unexpired risks when the war broke out and Mr. Palmer took them over.

My amendment provided that Mr. Palmer should pay these losses immediately out of the assets here in America owned by the German companies which came into his hands, as they would have had to do had there been no alien property custodian act.

This procedure in no way helped Germany or German interests, was perfectly right and proper, and was a wise amendment.

That Congress enacted the amendment and the President signed it is sufficient answer to Mr. Palmer's charge.

I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a statement by Mr. Daniel H. Dunham, president of the Firemen's Insurance Co., of Newark, and a reputable American citizen of my State, and I may say incidentally that the name "Dunham" is not German.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

DANIEL H. DUNHAM PROVOKED.

"Neal Bassett," referred to in the Palmer statement, is a vice president and western manager of the Firemen's Insurance Co., of this city. His home is in Chicago, and he could not be reached last night from here. Daniel H. Dunham, president of the Firemen's Co., was informed of the Palmer statement last night in his summer home in Belmar. He, too, was averse to discussing the statement without having himself read it, but he was provoked that anything but purely American motives should be attached to the appearance of Mr. Bassett in Washington in connection with the trading-with-the-enemy act.

"Mr. Bassett went to Washington for the sole purpose of urging an amendment to the trading-with-the-enemy act that would permit of the making of contract settlements between German and American insurance companies in order to prevent impounding of the money of American companies for the period of the war. We cared nothing about what the American Government did to the German companies, except that as loyal Americans we were equally interested with our Government in stopping German business activities here. Our whole effort was along strictly American business lines. We wanted to prevent financial hampering of our own company, and also to help prevent the creation of a financial situation that would have been serious to smaller companies that would have been unable to weather the proposed impounding of their money for a period that would be indefinite and probably long. It would have been a decided hardship to the Firemen's Co., but our assets and the general conditions of our business are such that we could have gotten through without any real distress, though the experience would have been an unpleasant one, to say the least.

"We had canceled our contracts for reinsurance that we had with German companies, and therefore had no further interest in those companies. Without the amendment to the trading-with-the-enemy act it would have been necessary for our company and other companies, many of them less able to do so, to pay out large sums of money for new reinsurance of a great volume of business. It would then have been impossible to get that money back, and all hands stood to make large losses. It is certain that some of the companies could not have survived, I believe.

PROTECTING AMERICAN COMPANIES.

"Protection of American insurance companies and the money that was rightfully theirs was our only thought. We didn't care about the foreign companies—were against them, as a matter of fact—and wanted only that the American Government care properly for the interests of the American business that was involved. Mr. Bassett was introduced to the Senate committee by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN. There was nothing wrong in that. His business there was legitimately in the interest of a large New Jersey business concern, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN is a United States Senator from New Jersey.

"It seems to me that little more need be said in connection with the statement issued by Attorney General Palmer. If he or anyone else puts upon the appearance in Washington of Mr. Bassett any different construction than what would be in keeping with what I have just said to you, it can be characterized as a falsehood."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. Palmer charges that in some way my own interests influenced me in this action because I represented insurance companies. That is untrue.

Before the war my companies had certain contracts with foreign reinsurance companies, two with companies in Bulgaria, and one Russian and one German company. Two of these contracts were immediately canceled and replaced with other reinsurance companies. One it was not necessary to cancel because it was a Russian company and it did not come within the jurisdiction of Mr. Palmer.

The other was a contract with the Balkan Insurance Co., held by the Stuyvesant Insurance Co., an American concern of which I am president. We had a contract with this Balkan Insurance Co., of Sofia, Bulgaria, although I am informed that the stock of the company was owned in Germany, but I never knew it until after it was taken by Mr. Palmer. This company was managed in the United States by Mr. William Scheide, whom Mr. Palmer afterwards appointed head of his insurance bureau.

Mr. Palmer took this company over and asked the Stuyvesant to cancel the contract.

We endeavored to procure other facilities to carry the liability to be surrendered.

As our directors felt there was no call for us to assume increased liabilities, and to cancel the Stuyvesant policies in which the Balkan Co. bore part of the risk would disorganize the Stuyvesant's business, the question was submitted to counsel to ascertain if in any way the company was taking a position that was unloyal or unpatriotic. Our counsel advised us that it could in no way inconvenience the United States; that under the contract we could hold the Balkan liable until the contract expired at the end of a year, and that it was our duty to do this in consideration of the stockholders and policyholders.

Mr. Palmer states that we were the only company that refused to cooperate in this matter. I am informed, and believe reliably, that this was not so; that one or two other companies refused to cancel their risks, including the North River Insurance Co., managed by Crum & Foster, to whom Mr. Palmer sold the German-owned International Co.

Such a charge as this tending to show antagonism with the trading-with-the-enemy act is malicious and made only to create a false and unfavorable impression.

Mr. Palmer again charges that in taking over the six great woolen mills in Passaic I protested against interfering with the official management of the properties and their sale by him. This is not so.

Mr. Palmer made a bitter attack in the papers against the industries and their management. Fearing the destruction of the entire woolen industry in Passaic, the president of the Passaic Board of Trade, the mill owners themselves, as well as several citizens, came to my office in Washington and urged me to see Mr. Palmer about it. I called on Mr. Palmer at the request of these constituents, and to the best of my recollection of the conversation urged that the industries be preserved to New Jersey, stating that there were thousands of employees in these mills who would be thrown out of employment should they be closed, and that unless the mills were continued great hardship would ensue to Passaic.

I cared not how the German interests were exterminated, but I did not wish the industries exploited for a Palmer holiday at the expense of the workingmen of New Jersey. What I did in that matter in no way gave encouragement to Germany or German interests. I have no apologies to make for my action; I would most certainly pursue the same course again were I called upon to do so.

Mr. Palmer charges that I opposed an amendment to the alien-property-custodian act which authorized him to sell the German industries in this country for which he was trustee. When the amendment came before the Senate I offered an amendment to the amendment providing all sales should be at public auction after being duly advertised. This amendment was approved by the Senate. In the House, at Mr. Palmer's request, it was further amended, providing that any public sale could be invalidated by Executive order of the President, on the theory that the property would return to German hands. When this amendment came to the Senate I opposed and voted against it, for the reason I believed that the act already safeguarded this point, that it was not proper legislation, and that great abuses might arise under it. I felt Mr. Palmer already had sufficient power to protect American interests and to destroy any German influence in the industries for which he was custodian. In that action I exercised my best judgment and voted against it, believing that it was bad legislation.

I never personally had any connection with or interest in any German company, corporation, or business, and no sympathy for their methods since the invasion of Belgium was begun. Before the war, as I have stated, insurance companies in which I was interested had certain contracts of reinsurance with foreign companies. I believe there were four. One of the companies in which I was interested, but had no say in the management, had a contract with the Munich Insurance Co., a large German reinsurance corporation, which also did business under similar contracts with a large number of American companies. This contract was canceled soon after our entrance into the war. Another contract was with the Rossia Insurance Co., at Petrograd, which was not affected, as the Alien Property Custodian did not take it over; another with the Bulgaria Insurance Co., which was canceled soon after our entrance into the war. The other was the Balkan contract which I have already mentioned.

Now, in order that the Senate may understand, I wish to explain very briefly what is meant by this system of reinsurance. Owing to the large value seeking insurance, it was a common practice for American and English insurance companies to relieve themselves of a part of their liability by reinsuring it in this class of companies called reinsurance companies. The separate risks were reported on a bordereau and premium settlements were made monthly. These companies were admitted legally to do business in the United States, depositing funds to protect their liability with the insurance commissioners. The contracts were agreed to by the directors of American companies and a large business was transacted with them. The facilities were welcomed by American companies and this plan of insurance had been in vogue for many years.

At the outset of the war there was a great demand for insurance, and the rightfully enforced retirement of these companies caused great embarrassment for the American companies that had contracts, inasmuch as they were compelled to care for the additional liability on account of their seizure by the Alien Property Custodian and withdrawal from active business.

Every fire insurance man, including myself, had but one desire, to protect American interests only and to prevent the retirement of loyal American companies who were reinsured with these companies from Germany and elsewhere, all of whom were operating in the United States. England had two years previously faced the same situation and confronted the same problem. It was a question of business policy, and the American underwriters handled it with great skill and loyalty and with no sympathy with German interests.

In my public acts in this connection I have never thought of my own personal interests. They were slight, very slight, compared with the other larger American companies that were interested. My knowledge of the situation I think helped to shape legislation wisely, and the result was that all American companies survived. I pursued the honorable course, as I believed, and I am not ashamed of it. I have done nothing except in the line of public duty, Mr. Palmer to the contrary.

I think that covers all of Mr. Palmer's specious and untrue charges. I insist, however, that the management of the office of the Alien Property Custodian be investigated and to that Mr. Palmer objects. Notwithstanding Mr. Palmer's objection, I demand that that be done, and be done immediately. I claim that that is my right as a United States Senator whose honor and patriotism have been attacked by a high official of the Government.

Mr. Palmer's vindictiveness proves what, on its face, to me always seemed axiomatic, that a man should never be appointed to an office where he will have the right to pass judgment on complaints against himself. If the Attorney General displays such spleen against me because I opposed confirmation of his appointment, will even his most ardent friends contend that the claims against him as Alien Property Custodian will be judged impartially by him as Attorney General? You all know, but the public does not know, that under the law claims against Mr. Palmer as Alien Property Custodian must, in the first instance, be presented to Mr. Palmer for allowance or disallowance. Why was he so anxious for the office of judge on claims against himself? Now that he is secure in such office, why does he bombard those who urge that his administration of the office of Alien Property Custodian should be investigated? Why does he oppose investigation? What has he done? Does he think that by calling me pro-German he will check my efforts to have him investigated? Does he think that he will so discredit me that any attack I may make will not be listened to by the people of this country?

He knows that my ancestors have been identified with New Jersey since prior to the Revolution and that there is not a single drop of German blood in me. My demands for preparedness, my disgust with the administration for the policy of "too proud to fight," and my indignation about the Lusitania and my contempt for Mr. Palmer and those like him who adopted the German doctrine that as Americans were warned of danger they should not have embarked on it, were well known when Germany forced war on us. I had no fear that anyone could say that I was pro-German, and I had no hesitation to demand justice for my constituents when those who had been pro-German went to extremes merely trying to throw dust in the eyes of the public and make our people forget their past.

I send to the desk a statement of Mr. Palmer's on the sinking of the Lusitania, and ask that it may be read by the Secretary at this period of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 9, 1915.]

RESPONSE TO TELEGRAPHIC REQUEST FOR EXPRESSION OF OPINION AS TO WHAT AMERICA'S ATTITUDE SHOULD BE ON THE SINKING OF THE "LUSITANIA."

STROUDSBURG, PA., May 8.

The loss of American lives on the Lusitania is a matter of grave concern to our people, but it does not, under the circumstances, call for immediate drastic action on the part of the United States. It certainly ought not to embroil us in this foreign war.

The Lusitania was flying the British flag and carrying munitions of war for the support of a belligerent. Neutral passengers who, in the face of warnings, undertook this perilous voyage, certainly assumed some risk themselves, for which the entire Nation ought not to be asked to suffer. Of course, the destruction of a passenger boat is horrible. War is always horrible.

This method of fighting is not humane—it is hardly civilized, but there is no such thing as humanity in civilized warfare. Our people may have the greatest confidence that the President will deal with this admittedly serious situation with a wise forbearance, which will make for peace without sacrifice of any of our real rights.

A. MITCHELL PALMER.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I did not oppose Mr. Palmer personally. For his information and that of this Senate and of the public I will say that I distrusted Mr. Palmer from the very bottom of my heart from the time that his weasel words about the sinking of the Lusitania were published in the New York Times. When later I discovered that he was an intermediary between the President and German agents, and when I learned that he, as such intermediary, tried to palliate the sinking of the Lusitania and that he was willing to help Germany secure cotton from which to manufacture explosives to sink more innocent women and children, I confess his desire to become judge of his own acts and his opposition to investigation merely strengthen the belief that he is not a man to be honored with public office. Such a man, to divert attention from his record, is capable of running amuck when placed in such a position as Attorney General.

At this point in my remarks I ask that there be inserted in the RECORD a statement of the conversation with Legal Agent Levy and Mr. John Simon, as reported in the memorandum, translated from the German, found in Dr. Albert's dispatch bag, relating to Mr. Palmer, which has never been satisfactorily answered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senator DILLINGHAM. I desire at this time to place in the record a copy of a memorandum found in the dispatch bag lost by Dr. Albert and mentioned by Senator FRELINGHUYSEN in connection with the publication in the New York World regarding an interview had by Mr. Palmer with the President. This has been furnished to me by the State Department, and is a translation of the original document, which was in German. I am informed by the State Department that no other paper relating to Gen. Palmer was found in the papers taken.

The memorandum referred to is here printed in full, as follows:

[Translation.]

CONVERSATION WITH LEGAL AGENT LEVY AND MR. JOHN SIMON.

NEW YORK, July 23, 1915.

Levy advises regarding a conference with M. P. Thereafter M. P. saw Lansing as well as Wilson. He informed both of them that an American syndicate had approached him which had strong German relations. This syndicate wishes to buy up cotton for Germany in great style, thereby to relieve the cotton situation and at the same time to provide Germany with cotton. The relations of the American syndicate to Germany are very strong, so that they might even possibly be able to influence the position of Germany in the general political question. M. P. therefore asked for a candid confidential statement, in order to make clear not only his own position but also necessarily the political opportunity. The result of the conversation was as follows:

1. The note of protest to England will go in any event, whether Germany answers satisfactorily or not.

2. Should it be possible to settle satisfactorily the Lusitania case, the President would bind himself to carry the protest against England through to the uttermost.

3. The continuance of the difference with Germany over the Lusitania case is "embarrassing" for the President in carrying out the protest against England. He will not create the impression that the note to Germany and the protest to England are a "bargain," for he has undisputed American rights to uphold.

4. A contemplated English proposal to buy cotton in great style and invest the proceeds in America would not satisfy the President as an answer to the protest, because that refers to the violation of American rights and not only to a question of money. (N. B.—M. P. believes that it will be possible to bring this plan to the front with the assistance of Southern Senators.)

5. The President, in order to ascertain from Mr. M. P. how strong the German influence of his syndicate is, would like to have trend of German note before the note is officially sent, and declares himself ready before the answer is drafted to discuss it with M. P., and eventually to so influence it that there will be an agreement for its reception and also to be ready to influence the press through a wink.

6. As far as the note itself is concerned, which he awaits, so he awaits another expression of regret, which was not followed in the last note. Regret, together with the statement that nobody had expected that human lives would be lost and that the ship would sink so quickly.

The President is said to have openly declared that he could hardly hope for a positive statement that the submarine warfare would be discontinued. Germany should only, out of consideration for friendly America, declare herself to be prepared to discuss with the United States and to work together with her to make impossible the destruction of American lives. Germany shall declare herself ready to make the strongest efforts to reach this goal, but to expect that America will work with her in this respect. The President is of the opinion that Americans who in the present situation take passage on a munitions-laden ship "take their lives into their own hands." The President seems to expect that we ourselves shall set forth an agreement in the matter, possibly leaving out the principle and fall back upon the above-mentioned mutual endeavors.

The foregoing information sounds almost unbelievable. If it is correct, the President has not understood the German note at all, and, on the other hand, does not know what he says in his note. The diplomatic expressions and the meaning of a "deliberately unfriendly act" do not seem to be clear to him.

M. P. again emphasized how very much the President was upset and disturbed about the matter, how much he wishes to come out of the matter, how he emphasized that the note to England had been ready when the Lusitania case came up, and how he held out to M. P. that if he could clear up this matter how very much obliged to him he would be.

If the plan is to be carried through, he promises beforehand telegraphic connections with Germany.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, my business is fire insurance; that was and is well known. I believe that I understand my business. Had Mr. Palmer had his way, he would have crippled and ruined many American companies that had prewar contracts with German companies. I opposed him and sponsored one of my constituents who represented one of the largest New Jersey companies. Because we prevented his destruction of companies that had contracts with German companies, he now rails at both of us. He knows well that we cared nothing for the German companies and that all we sought was the safeguarding of American interests.

For my opposition to Mr. Palmer, both as a man and as Alien Property Custodian, I have no apologies. When I saw companies slaughtered, I could not approve. Perhaps he now realizes that it was not the Germans but Americans he was injuring by his foolish course, dictated by his wild desire to make all forget that he received German agents in his own house. If he was engaged in legitimate business, why did he receive them at his home and not at his or their office?

The fund derived from the proceeds of the sale of German property is the fund from which we hope to pay losses of our citizens. If it does not prove sufficient—and we know it will not—will Mr. Palmer be praised or blamed? Has he not boasted that he did not try to sell at the best times properties he knows were sacrificed? I have never said that he personally profited in a pecuniary way. Many got bargains. Many profited by their purchases—at figures much below real values. Does Mr. Palmer count them among his friends? In that way has he not profited? Does any one of you doubt it? In proportion to its size of population, my State received perhaps the most attention from Mr. Palmer. With no taint of pro-Germanism, constituents, enraged at his conduct, appealed to me. My attention repeatedly was called to the experience, or rather lack of experience, of the agents selected by him to conserve and direct large industries. It is no secret, and all New Jersey knows that many of those appointed were personal or political friends of the secretary to the President. If Mr. Palmer expected that I would be afraid to insist that industries in New Jersey should receive fair play, he was mistaken.

I had no German record to haunt me, to make me countenance unjust and arbitrary conduct on his part. Justice will ultimately prevail. There are many who in their hearts distrust Mr. Palmer, his duplicity and his high-handed methods, as much as I do.

The New York World, in an editorial in its issue of February 28, 1919, said when the letters "M. P." were found in the dispatch of Dr. Albert:

> The identity of "M. P." thus remains undetermined. But the mystery should be cleared up. Mr. Palmer himself should insist upon it in advance of his confirmation by the Senate. It is a small matter as between himself and others mentioned who shall be the next Attorney General. It is a great matter that the American people should know positively that "M. P." is not the next Attorney General of the United States. Who was "M. P."?

Mr. Palmer could not deny that he was the "M. P." referred to; in fact, he admits it. The New York World now is silent in its opposition. Were it not the time when friends of the administration believe that they must close their eyes to its faults, would it be silent?

Neither names nor threats can make me hesitate for a moment in denouncing the high-handed proceedings or from calling attention to the fact that the office of Alien Property Custodian was administered by Mr. Palmer in a high-handed way in the hope that thereby he would cause the public to forget that he had been the intermediary between the President and German agents. I opposed and will ever oppose Mr. Palmer:

First. Because he publicly proclaimed, as did the Germans, that Americans, having been warned of danger, should not have sailed on the Lusitania.

Second. Because he was an intermediary between the President and German agents, willing and anxious to have the Lusitania incident condoned and to secure cotton for Germany, so that she might manufacture explosives to destroy more helpless women and children.

Third. Because in an endeavor to make the public forget his pro-Germanism he conducted the office of Alien Property Custodian in a high-handed manner.

Fourth. Because as Alien Property Custodian he did not secure the best possible prices for property seized by him, and as a result the alien-property fund will probably be insufficient to satisfy claims of our citizens.

Fifth. Because his administration of the office of Alien Property Custodian has profited the few who secured bargains at his sales and was not for the benefit of the country as a whole.

Sixth. Because under the law the Attorney General is the office of the Government to pass on claims against the Alien Property Custodian; and, in my opinion, aside from the impropriety of an accused being his own judge, it is not fair to compel claimants who have had bitter quarrels with Mitchell Palmer as Alien Property Custodian to now present their claims against him as Alien Property Custodian to him as Attorney General.

In conclusion let me say that Mr. Palmer resents criticism and will not hesitate to use all the great power of his office to intimidate those who oppose him. His contact with German agents has taught him the power of bureaucracy. If he has nothing to fear, why does he oppose investigation and abuse those who urge it? Why, having been Alien Property Custodian, did he fight for the office of Attorney General, so that he could be the judge of claims against himself? Why did Mr. Bradley Palmer urge in Paris a provision in the treaty whitewashing the Alien Property Custodian?

Mr. Palmer has indeed learned from the German agents.

He is more Prussian than the Prussians.

I denounced the Prussians and their ways, and no one of their disciples can intimidate me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside——

Mr. SMOOT. I shall object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to call up his bill and it will lead to no discussion, I am perfectly willing that it shall pass; but I do not want to lay the unfinished business temporarily aside.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought the request I was making was the orderly procedure.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to lay it aside at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 140, H. R. 7594.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection if it will not lead to discussion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not desire to object in the end, but I think the speech that has just been made on the floor of the Senate should be answered now. I am not willing to have any other business intervene, because I desire to say something in reference to the speech that has just been made by the Senator from New Jersey. Intervening business will carry us away from that point, and on the request for unanimous consent I suppose I can make the statement that I desire to make. Of course, I have no real objection to the passage of the bill referred to by the Senator from New York. As a matter of fact, I am in favor of that bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? He seems to have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill to which he has referred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Pershing bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that request?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no objection upon my part if it does not lead to discussion.

Mr. LODGE. There will not be any discussion.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not intend to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill and have that consent granted and then have speeches made upon an entirely different topic. It seems to me that it would be gravely improper to continue the discussion upon this matter of the Attorney General as Custodian of Alien Property in connection with a proposal to make John J. Pershing a general of the Army of the United States.

Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Alabama desires, of course, to address the Senate upon the matter which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has just discussed; and in view of that fact I prefer to withdraw my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator to allow me to make this statement. It is rarely that I claim the floor of the Senate, but I think the matter that has just been discussed is of too grave importance to go to the country without some contradictions being made; and therefore I shall be greatly obliged if the Senator will not press his request at this moment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withdraw the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Alabama to yield to me for just about three minutes by the clock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should be glad to yield to the Senator, but if it is for a speech I want to make one right now myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I listened with some astonishment to the statement that has just been made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] in reference to the Alien Property Custodian. I would not trespass upon the time of the Senate at this time and in this manner if it were not for the fact that there are certain statements contained in that speech that should be met and contradicted at this time.

I want to say to the Senate that I have some responsibility in this matter myself. When the original alien-property-custodian act was passed it provided for the taking over of the German property and the preservation of the German property for the German people that owned it, notwithstanding the fact that the junker classes of Germany, the aristocracy of Germany, the wealth of Germany that owned this property, were the men that stood behind the Kaiser in his diabolical assaults on civilization. They were the men who approved the sinking of the Lusitania. They were the men who stood behind the Kaiser when he made his assault on innocent Belgium. They were the men who countenanced the taking captive of women and carrying them into slavery. They were the men who, by their financial strength and aid, sustained the power of the German Government in the ruthless war it was carrying on. When the time came, at the suggestion of the administration, I introduced the amendment to put teeth into the alien-property-custodian act and take this property away from German citizens, the millionaires of Germany, the aristocracy of Germany, the junker class of Germany; and ever since it has been done it has been assaulted by the German interests.

Who are to pay the claims of American citizens for the sinking of the Lusitania, the taking of American property, the destruction of American lives, if we do not hold intact this fund of the Alien Property Custodian? Collect it out of Germany? How can you collect it out of a broken-down, devastated country? Must you send your bayonets back there to collect your debts, or are you going to preserve intact this property—$750,000,000—to pay the claims of American citizens for wrongs and for property destroyed in this war? That is the issue that is before the Senate.

This attack was made in a mild way when the amendment was offered to the alien-property-custodian act. This attack has been made continually ever since. I do not deny that men have a right to fight for their property interests or to protect their rights, but I think we might as well know what they are fighting for. I do not say that these Germans have not a right to come here before Congress and present their claims if they want to, but we might as well know what they are doing, and the men who appeared in this hearing before the Judiciary Committee and assaulted the Alien Property Custodian in this manner, as a rule, were the paid, hired attorneys of these German interests, representing claims of Germans, wanting to get back this property that has been taken away from them, and the record shows it. Every one of these questions against the Alien Property Custodian that the Senator from New Jersey raises here was raised before the Subcommittee on the Judiciary. Here is the report. Those questions were answered there; and notwithstanding the fact that the cases of the claimants of this German property were ably represented, a unanimous finding of a committee composed of a majority on that side of the Chamber found that these charges were without justification, and unanimously found a verdict against what the Senator from New Jersey contends for now, because I take it for granted that if this committee had for one instant sustained the charges that are contended for by the Senator from New Jersey they would not have brought into this Chamber a unanimous report in favor of the confirmation of Mr. Palmer as Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. Does the Senator know whether there were any witnesses called before that committee under subpœna?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think, if my understanding is correct, that most of the witnesses were furnished or proposed by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is not so, and it does not answer the question. Were any witnesses called by the committee under subpœna?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so. My understanding of it is—I may be mistaken; the Senator from New Jersey can correct me if I am mistaken, and there are other Senators on the committee—but my understanding is that this charge—not in the way of a charge, because the Senator denied that, but by way of a suggestion—was made by the Senator from New Jersey against the confirmation of Mr. Palmer. The Senator from New Jersey, if I am not mistaken, suggested to the committee the names of the witnesses he wanted examined. Is not that correct?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I mentioned several men who desired to appear.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is correct.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I also requested that the committee call a number of witnesses; and, at the request of the ex-attorney general of New York that certain witnesses be called to prove, as he stated, that Mr. Palmer had favored friends in the sale of these properties, I requested the committee to call those witnesses, and they failed to do it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will come to that in a minute. The Senator is correct that the committee did fail to summon certain witnesses, but manifestly why? Because the witnesses they had summoned on the suggestion of the attorneys for these German interests and on the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey failed to develop anything that was worthy of consideration in this case; and why should they have delayed the case, after an investigation lasting for months, to continue to run out an endless chain that would have led nowhere and brought no information? I hold in my hand a document with the testimony in it, a more or less voluminous document, failing to sustain a single charge that is made in this instance.

I want to say this: The Senator from New Jersey has made on the floor of the Senate—and I do not know with what authority; he can quote his authority—the charge that the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Palmer, is opposing an investigation of the Alien Property Custodian's office. Now, I happen to know that that statement is not true. I know it from first authority. I have talked with the Attorney General on this subject, and I know what his views are. I do not know who warranted the Senator from New Jersey in making that statement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield; certainly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I made that statement on the attack Mr. Palmer made on me, in which he argued against any investigation by saying that American interests were not desiring the investigation, and in commenting upon it I assumed that Mr. Palmer himself was opposing the investigation. I am delighted to hear the statement of the Senator from Alabama that Mr. Palmer does not oppose the investigation. That is what I have been contending for all along.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Palmer has made a written statement on the subject. What he said about the American interests not being in favor of the investigation is shown by the investigation of the Committee on the Judiciary. There are no American interests asking for an investigation of A. Mitchell Palmer. The men who appeared there appeared as the attorneys representing the German interests.

I say that the Attorney General is not opposing an investigation. Now, I will say to the Senate what he said to me. It is no assumption from a newspaper article, it is no secondhand information such as the Senator from New Jersey is furnishing the Senate, assuming a position because of personal criticism. That is not the issue before the Senate. The personal relations between the Attorney General of the United States and the Senator from New Jersey are not questions before the Senate, but there is a grave question before the Senate, and that is the protection of the property taken from the German interests for the claimants in the United States.

What the Attorney General told me before he left here is that he did not oppose an investigation of the matter, but that if it was made he wanted it made in the interest of the American people and not in the interest of the German claimants. He asked me to introduce amendments proposing that if the investigation is made it shall not be made by men who are the paid agents of the German junker class, and I propose whenever the question comes before the Senate to offer those amendments.

That is the position of the Attorney General. More than that, the investigation proposes to have an auditing made of all the books of the Alien Property Custodian. There are 40,000 different accounts, 40,000 different pieces of property taken, valued in the neighborhood of $750,000,000. I think the auditing of those accounts ought to be made, the Government thinks it ought to be made, the Attorney General of the United States thinks it ought to be made, and it is being made to-day. A company of bonded accountants are auditing and passing on those accounts to-day. It will probably be 60 or 90 days before they complete their report. It will cost not less than $150,000 to do the work. It is being done in the interest of the Government by a bonded auditing company, and why should Congress duplicate that work until that report it made? Why should it spend another $150,000 or $200,000 in digging into those books when in 60 or 90 days the audit will be made and published? I can see no necessity unless it is for the purpose of hiring auditors to act as a smelling committee to try to find some reason to get this property back into the hands of the Germans from whom it was taken. That is all there is in it. That is all there is in the charges that were made against the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand the Senator from New Jersey to make a statement to the effect that Mr. Palmer had favored some of his personal friends in the disposition of the property. My understanding is that all the property disposed of by the Alien Property Custodian was disposed of under a procedure devised by a commission appointed by the Alien Property Custodian, and that Mr. Palmer had no personal part in the specific disposition of the property. I should like to know if the Senator from Alabama has any information regarding that point.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have, and I am glad the Senator brought it up. There are just three points upon which this question could be considered as to whether there is need for an investigation—first, as to whether the Alien Property Custodian took over all the property he could; second, as to whether he properly disposed of the property that he took over in the American interests; and the third is as to whether he was honest and properly kept his books. That is all you can get out of an investigation.

In passing, before answering the Senator's question, first let me say that the Alien Property Custodian took over all the property in sight that was held by German interests or people who were alien enemies technically under the property custodian act and interested in alien companies. Of course, that included some American citizens. The purpose in taking that property was to keep the earnings, the dividends, the usufruct of it from getting into Germany in any way. There was a vast deal of German property in this country belonging to German citizens who were living here, most of them small owners, not committing acts against our Government, and it was the policy of the Alien Property Custodian to leave them undisturbed, and that was the policy of Congress, and nobody questioned it. We were not attacking Germans living on American soil. We were attacking in the act passed by Congress the German who stood behind the firing line of the Kaiser's army in Germany. The Alien Property Custodian took steps to take over that property. When it came to selling that property it was his purpose to sell the property and convert it into dollars for a trust fund to look after the American people and, more than that, to get money to carry on the war. Every dollar that the alien enemy property brought forth was invested in what? In liberty bonds to aid in carrying on the war and in fighting the common enemy.

Mr. Palmer had no more to do with the disposition of the property directly than you and I had. He could not have done it. It was manifestly impossible for him to do it. There were 40,000 different pieces of property, valued at $750,000,000. Do you mean to say that one man could do it? No; he provided a selling organization under which the property should be sold. He provided rules and regulations for the disposition of the property. I will not occupy the time of the Senate in reading it now, because it fills three or four pages of printed matter, but anyone who is interested can find it at page 114 of the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary in the matter of the nomination of A. Mitchell Palmer to be Attorney General of the United States.

The important thing in the matter, as the Senator from New Mexico asked me, is, Who passed on the sale of the property? The Alien Property Custodian did not pass on it himself, but he selected a committee of the ablest men in the United States that he could find to pass on the question as to the value and the reasons for selling the property. And whom did he put on the committee?

Otto T. Bannard. Otto T. Bannard is the president of the board of trustees of the New York Trust Co. and was once a Republican candidate for mayor of the city of New York. He is a member of the Yale Corporation board of trustees, of Yale College, and is well recognized everywhere in the country, where he is known as an outstanding, big, able American citizen. He was chairman of the selling committee.

The other members were Cleveland H. Dodge, whom all of you know. He is a trustee of Princeton, a great mining, manufacturing, and banking man. Next to him was George L. Ingraham, who had been for years the presiding judge of the Supreme Court of New York, who was then the president of the New York City Bar Association, a man respected, loved, and revered by men everywhere, and I understand in political faith he is a Republican.

The next man was Ralph Stone, president of the Detroit Trust Co., of Michigan, a graduate of the University of Michigan and of Swarthmore College, one of the ablest financiers of the West, and in political affiliation I understand he is a Democrat.

The other and last member of the board was Benjamin H. Griswold, jr., who is to-day senior member of the firm of Alexander Brown & Son, among the big private bankers of Baltimore, a man of distinguished ability and high standing in finance, and I understand in political faith he is a Democrat.

Here is a board of men, the strongest that could be picked, serving the Government without pay, serving for a patriotic purpose, and Mr. Palmer, Alien Property Custodian, said there was not a single sale made or ratified until this sales board had investigated it and investigated every sale to its minute details and approved it. In any case where they withheld their approval the sale was not ratified.

Now, this is not the action of A. Mitchell Palmer. These acts were done by a board of distinguished business men of the highest standing in America, a majority of the board Republican in faith. These are the men whom it is proposed to investigate in the interest of trying to smell out some way to get this property back into treacherous German hands. That is what it means; that is what it spells.

So far as I am concerned I hold no commission to defend A. Mitchell Palmer. He is able to defend his personal character and his acts himself. But you and I wrote on the statute books of the land the amendment to the alien-property-custodian act that took this property, took it as a matter of war, took it as a matter of protection, took it to preserve the rights of American citizens who had claims against Germany, and I do not propose to stand here and have it assaulted and misrepresented and the Senate and the public misled in reference to it without entering my protest.

Now, in reference to this insurance question about which the Senator from New Jersey is criticizing Mr. Palmer. The German insurance companies are reinsurers of American policies. The Government ordered it stopped and took over some of them wherever organized in this country, and why? What was the German to pass on? Where was our vulnerable point? Those men were insuring our ships. What did the insurance policy say? It said, with reference to the ship, where it is going to sail from and where it is going to sail to and what kind of a cargo it is going to carry. Do you think that the Alien Property Custodian and the President of the United States would have been loyal to the people of America if they had allowed these German insurance companies to continue to reinsure American policies and obtain this information for the use of their bloody submarine warfare? The Alien Property Custodian did only what was right, what was in the interest of American lives and American people and the American soldier. He took over these German insurance companies such as he could, and then the President drove the balance of them out of America. That is all there is in that proposition.

The Senator from New Jersey claims that all claims against the Alien Property Custodian must come through the Attorney General. The Attorney General has nothing whatever to do with the matter except technically. That was stated in the executive session very clearly by one of the Senators who was on this investigation committee. If anybody has a claim against the Alien Property Custodian for taking over his property illegally, under section 9 of the alien-property-custodian act, he can go into the Federal courts of the United States and sue, and the only connection that the Attorney General of the United States has with it at all is that a local district attorney may be called upon to defend that suit in the interest of the American people. There is no action by the Attorney General himself except that he represents the Government in an adverse action.

There is an opportunity to settle these cases out of court with the Alien Property Custodian, but Mr. Palmer is no longer the Alien Property Custodian. If they are not satisfied with the settlement they can go into the courts of the land, and the man who decides the case is not the Attorney General of the United States but the judge on the bench. I find some of the attorneys shown in this record representing German claimants, like this McNeill Co., that admits on the record that it put up a camouflage to fool the British people to buy their inventions. That state of conditions exists. You do not have to take my word for it, for it is all of record. If the record is searched it will be disclosed who the witnesses were and who were behind them, namely, attorneys acting on behalf of German claims against this property. I thank God that we have an Attorney General now who is going on fighting the German interests and protecting this property for American citizens.

There is one other word I want to say in this matter. This charge has been made; and it has been contradicted time and time again; but the Senator from New Jersey seeks to besmirch the character of the Attorney General by assuming that he was allied with German interests. There is no man in the United States who has been more loyal to the American flag, who has used his great power with more force in striking down the Germans who were carrying on this war against us, than has A. Mitchell Palmer in his assault on their pocketbooks. The Germans have published his recent report. I have not the paper at hand at this moment, but if you will take the German edition, which is here in the Capitol, of the Alien Property Custodian's report, and examine their criticism and analysis of that report, it will be shown that they are already seeking to try to find the ways and means to drag back from the Government of the United States the property that was taken by the Alien Property Custodian and return it to German hands.

I say to the Senate that this is no time to weaken. Let the world know in the future as we have let it know in the recent past that the Nation that fires on the American flag and destroys American property and murders American citizens must not only pay for it with its blood but with its dollars. Let them know that if they assault this great Nation, their property in this country for the future is confiscated. We will thereby cause them to halt and consider before they engage in another war on us.

I desire to make merely one more reference to these charges. Let me read you what Mr. Palmer himself said in regard to the so-called Albert papers which were found. A newspaper tried to connect Mr. Palmer with the incident because he had the initials "M. P." Let the record show what he said. Nobody is able to deny his statement; nobody can controvert it. Do Senators on either side of the Chamber for one minute believe that the President of the United States would have made A. Mitchell Palmer the Alien Property Custodian if he had doubted his loyalty? Does any Senator believe for a moment that the President of the United States would have made Mitchell Palmer Attorney General of the United States if he had doubted his loyalty? Yet above all men in the world the President of the United States was the one man who was absolutely cognizant of and knew the facts in reference to the charge made by the Senator from New Jersey, because the charge is that this "M. P.," whom the Senator from New Jersey tries to convert into Mitchell Palmer, had disclosed to German agents a conversation which took place between him and the President of the United States. Was not the President of the United States conversant with the fact as to whether any such conversation took place? Palmer denies it. The President knows whether or not it is true; he is the one man in the United States who does know. The Senator from New Jersey by implication, if you believe this was true, would charge the President of the United States not only with being disloyal to the Government but with being disloyal to himself. It is absurd; it is a mere piece of mud that has been thrown out from enemy sources to besmirch the character of a clean, just, and able man.

Now, here is what he says. It has been printed. I am now quoting from Mr. Palmer's testimony:

> When the Albert papers were published by the New York World the New York World printed what was alleged to be a memorandum found amongst the Albert papers in which reference was made to the visit to the White House of one "M. P." I had never heard of Albert; I did not know there was such a person living at that time, and of course I was amazed to find this memorandum with a reference to "M. P." and a garbled, exaggerated, and entirely different statement of what I had told Mr. Stanchfield.

Prior to this he said that Mr. Stanchfield was a lawyer who had called on him in reference to securing a shipping line. Most men knew of Mr. Stanchfield, his ability and standing as a lawyer in New York. Then Mr. Palmer continues:

> The New York World telegraphed me, I think, and asked me for an explanation. I made this statement, which is printed in your hearings, and which, as I recall, is about what I said:

This is what was published in the New York World:

> The story published in the World this morning, which implies, though it does not say, I am the mysterious "M. P." referred to in somebody's report of an alleged conversation with the President, is all a fairy tale as far as I am concerned. I never had any such conversation with the President and never reported any such conversation to anybody, anywhere, at any time. I never saw this Dr. Albert, whose private memoranda are presumably being published by the World, and I never heard of him until these articles began appearing. I never had any communication of any kind or any character with him.

Could there be a more complete, absolute denial of this whole proposition than Mr. Palmer made then when it was published by the New York World and makes now? Mark you, these gentlemen who are still charging him with this connection, with being the "M. P." referred to in the New York World, have no proof to sustain the charge. They are harking back to this newspaper article which was the emanation of some sensational brain which was endeavoring to stir the American people before we became involved in the war. But there is not one line of proof. In the last analysis, there is just one great witness to prove the case as to whether or not it was true that A. Mitchell Palmer had a conversation with the President of the United States and disclosed that conversation to the Albert man, and that one witness is the President of the United States, who, I repeat, would not only be disloyal to the country but disloyal to himself if he had appointed A. Mitchell Palmer Attorney General of the United States had this charge been true.

So, I say these charges emanated from German interests. They are slanders which have been spread abroad for a purpose. It is not that they care who A. Mitchell Palmer is or what becomes of him; but they are fighting for their dirty dollars; they are hiring lawyers to get back this blood money. So far as I am concerned, they will not take it back so long as I can stand in the Senate and protest against it, if I can help it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I had intended to indulge in some rather extensive remarks in answer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], but, after listening very carefully and attentively to the remarks of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], I believe that nearly everything, if not every single thing, that I had it in mind to say would be in supererogation. I shall, therefore, not say much upon this particular question.

Mr. President, "following war comes the aftermath." There must come all of that seething element in America which is either sympathetically or financially attached to Germany. It must in some way be heard through the newspapers, upon the floor of the House, upon the floor of the Senate, in the magazines, in public meetings, or in some other way. It can not seethe itself out. The seething must be vocalized by somebody somewhere. The aftermath has started, in my opinion, in this unprovoked, uncalled for, and absolutely unjustified attack upon the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I make the point of order——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In a moment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I make the point of order against the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is one of the peculiar properties of a seething mass——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi will suspend for a moment——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said "wait a moment."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until the Chair is advised with regard to the purpose for which the Senator from New Jersey has risen.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hear a friend say, "It is a point of order." I beg the Chair's pardon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XIX of the Senate, which provides that—

> No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have said nothing about any Senator at all; I have named no Senator and referred to no Senator. I have referred to a propaganda and a movement that is finding a voice in public in some way or other at this time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator stated that he had never listened to such an unwarranted attack; he said that it was the aftermath of war; he said it was due to German influence and German activity. If necessary, I shall ask that the RECORD be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair unfortunately did not observe the language of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I will repeat it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi understands the rule, and the Chair is sure he will avoid any reference forbidden by the rules in the future, but the Chair in this instance can not rule upon the question raised.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have carefully avoided anything of that unparliamentary sort, and have proceeded and shall proceed carefully to avoid it. What I said in substance was that "after war came the aftermath; that we had a right to expect it; and that in the seething caldron of German financial and sympathetic emotions in America we were prepared to see all sorts of attacks made upon this floor, the floor of the other House, in the newspapers, and in the magazines, and all sorts of propaganda that would find its vocalization in public." Now, if the Chair rules that that is out of order, I should like to know how it can be; but if he does, I will not repeat it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Does he assume for a moment that I entertain any sentimental feelings toward Germany, or that in my speech I intimated anything of that character?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, Mr. President, I have already indicated by my indirect method of making the statement that I did not. I do not regard the Senator as the chief mover in this business. I believe that the Senator was led by the fact that he was a Senator of the United States to represent, very innocently, some of the business interests of his State here and some of its financial interests, believing himself that he was representing something right; but I believe that that force which behind him led him into it, without knowing just what the full force behind him was, was just such a force as I have described.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, does the Senator assert that I in any way represent any German interests in New Jersey or anywhere else?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, I have not said that. I have said just what I have said, and the RECORD will show it.

Mr. President, I had intended to say a few words in defense of A. Mitchell Palmer, but not because he needs them but because I want to say them. There is not a man in America who has not been made indignant by this attack upon him other than those who have been amused by it. The indignation goes out from those who know the men who stirred up and started the attack and the amusement goes to those who have more or less innocently carried it on.

I served with Mitchell Palmer in the House of Representatives for several years. I know him intimately and well. I am a very fair judge of honest, intelligent men. He was very good natured, amiable, public-spirited, patriotic, and clean—he is as clean as a hound's tooth.

No man who knows himself well, and knows Mitchell Palmer well, and is at the same time a man of honest intent, can draw any other conclusion from an intimate acquaintance with the man himself. I have been serving in public life some 24 years—25 and a little bit over—more than a quarter of a century. If I were called upon to pick out the three cleanest men I have ever known in public life I would pick Mitchell Palmer as one of the three; and I believe that if any other man who served with him were called upon to designate three of the cleanest men he ever knew—the most honest and straightforward and patriotic, intellectually honest as well as personally and financially honest—he would pick out Mitchell Palmer as one of them. And yet the unprecedented act of holding up a nomination of the President of the United States for a Cabinet position—one of his private political family—has occurred in connection with Mitchell Palmer.

So far as I now recall, the Federalists controlling the Senate when Jefferson was President, Democrats controlling the Senate with a Republican President, and afterwards when Republicans were controlling the Senate with a Democratic President, no Senate has undertaken to hold back the nomination of a member of the Cabinet—the President's private political family—because a cabinet in America is not like a cabinet in Great Britain or France; it is a body of Secretaries collected to advise the President, and collected by the President. It has ever been deemed an act of distinct discourtesy to a President of the United States not to confirm an appointment to the Cabinet.

Now, why is it that a man of peculiarly clean character—a pacifist before the war; yes, as I was; he more than I, because he is by religion a Quaker—why should a man of peculiarly clean character, private and public, have been singled out for this unprecedented act, unless there were, unconsciously to those who represented them upon this floor, of course, some strong interests behind the opposition somewhere in the United States?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, is the Senator aware of the fact that I was replying to an attack made by Mr. Palmer on me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; and I was also aware of the fact that Mr. Palmer's so-called attack upon you was merely a reply to your attack upon him—an unjustified attack.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, Mr. Palmer undoubtedly was informed of that attack, and, as I understood, it was made in secret session; and I merely wish to say that I did not inform Mr. Palmer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator appeared before that committee in a so-called secret session. I should like to know where a secret session is to be found in connection with the Senate of the United States. I never have found one. I remember reading a 10-minute speech made in a secret session of the Senate once, an executive session, verbatim, just as it was pronounced in the Senate. I do not know about that. I am not prepared to go into that. Some people have said that they hid men up above here. I do not know; but the Senator may rely upon it, of course, that if he and Mitchell Palmer were both witnesses before that committee, neither what he said was hidden from Mitchell Palmer nor what Mitchell Palmer said was hidden from him. He knows that as well as I do, and there is absolutely no tail or head to the kite of that particular interrogation.

Mitchell Palmer first came to the House as an untried Representative from the State of Pennsylvania. I happened to be at that time in a position where it was a part of my duty to learn about men, to know whether they were trustworthy or not, whether they were clean and reliable and straight. I heard all sorts of things about all sorts of men coming in, but I never heard but one line of adverse conversation about Mitchell Palmer, even from the Republicans. He has fought some of the most partisan fights ever made in the State of Pennsylvania, some of the fights where human passion rolled violently in a tempest wave over the soil of Pennsylvania, and until he was nominated Attorney General I never heard, nor was there brought to my knowledge in any way, one word of aspersion against Mitchell Palmer. I would trust him with my life, I would trust him with my fortune, and I believe that the Senator from New Jersey would trust him with his life and his fortune, with the absolute knowledge that Mitchell Palmer would take no advantage of the trust either to his own interest or to anybody else's, or in the interest of his own vindictiveness, even if he had any, and he is not the sort of man to have any vindictiveness.

There were a good many things I wanted to say, but the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said them before me, as well and probably better than I could say them, and therefore I shall not say them now.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I gave notice that to-day, if convenient, I would make some remarks on the pending treaty. I desire now to state that I shall take the liberty of postponing them until to-morrow.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD resolutions of the Confederate Veterans of Mississippi in favor of the league of nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Memorial from De Soto Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 220, to the Congress of the United States.

Whereas the fundamental principles of the Christian religion is peace, and Jesus commanded Peter to put up his sword, telling him My kingdom is not of this world; and

Whereas the people of the United States and most of the civilized nations of both continents claim to be Christian nations, following in the footsteps of Jesus of Nazareth; and

Whereas war is the reverse of Christianity, sanctioning every from of crime from theft, robbery, arson, rape, to murder, and necessarily overthrows civilization and Christianity; and

Whereas all difficulties and differences between nations can be settled by a congress of nations without loss of life, honor, or property, and even if not settled justly the loser would not lose the life of one good citizen, to say nothing of the loss of thousands of lives and millions of dollars in property by war in the inexpressible suffering on battle fields, in loathsome prisons, and heartbreaking desolation of the widows and orphans of the slain: Therefore be it

Resolved by this camp in regular annual session, That we respectfully petition your honorable body to take immediate decisive action for cessation of war throughout the civilized world by securing the cooperation of all civilized nations willing to join the United States in establishing a congress of nations fully empowered to permanently and finally adjudicate all national and international differences and difficulties by the league of nations.

Signed by committee.

W. S. WEISSINGER, M. D.
T. J. WILROY.
T. J. O'DONNELL, Adjutant.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, headed "The world's best hope," dealing with the league of nations, with what defects it has, as still being the world's best hope for civilization and peace.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican of Thursday, Aug. 14, 1919.]

"THE WORLD'S BEST HOPE.

"No American can quarrel with Senator LODGE'S eloquent declaration that the United States is the 'world's best hope,' but the time has come to convert hopes into some measure of reality. The United States is no longer an infant Moses cradled in the bulrushes; it no longer serves mankind sufficiently by continuing to exist. We are told that the part of Tuesday's oration which commanded most applause was the fine passage in which the Senator declared: 'Call me selfish, if you will, conservative, or reactionary, but an American I have remained all my life. I can never be anything else but an American, and I must think of the United States first.' It was a fine sentiment finely expressed, and nobody disputes the depth and sincerity of Senator LODGE'S Americanism. But was he a whit less of an American in June, 1915, when he declared in his speech at Union College that 'nations must unite as men unite to preserve peace and order'? Was he failing to think of America first when he added that the great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, 'You must not go to war'? It is not to be credited for a moment.

"In his speech to the Senate Tuesday this distinguished historian used his wealth of learning to show how for centuries idealists had vainly pursued the phantom of perpetual peace, and how fine ideals led only to the iniquities of the Holy Alliance. But in 1915 he knew all this, yet rebuked those who lacked faith: 'It may seem Utopian at this moment to suggest a union of civilized nations in order to put a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace and international order, but it is through the aspirations for perfection, through the searches for Utopias, that the real advances have been made. At all events, it is along this path that we must travel if we are to attain in any measure to the end we all desire of peace upon earth.' In this fine passage we find nothing selfish, nothing reactionary, and nothing un-American. What has happened since 1915 to change so radically Senator LODGE'S views? Is it that the time has come to pass from words to deeds?

"The time to urge that this Nation hold aloof from foreign entanglements was the precise time when the senior Senator from Massachusetts was so ably pleading for a league of nations and when the President of the United States was doing his best to keep the country out of the war. When the United States, with the reluctant yet convinced support of the people, threw its mighty weight into the balance the effect was not simply to vindicate American rights against German aggression; it was not simply to defeat Germany and upset the throne of its war lord. By intervening with its full strength on the side of one of the great alliances, by holding up to Europe the American ideals of democracy and the rights of peoples, the United States smashed the old Europe to atoms. Does it square with the fine American ideals which Senator LODGE was upholding in 1915 to refuse now to help mend the damage done?"

"Senator LODGE fears that even if the covenant is so safeguarded as not to put the United States under any legal obligation there will be incurred a moral obligation which he finds quite as alarming. But does not the moral obligation already exist? Can we decently pull out after tearing down the old and refuse to lend a hand in shaping the new? If the new is not to be better than the old the danger is that it will be much worse. While the Senate discusses the league of nations reaction is getting a new grip. Senator LODGE denounces the Holy Alliance, but the deplorable fact is that if the spirit of the Holy Alliance is growing apace in Europe it is because of the partisan temper which has been manifested within the United States Senate.

"It was true without qualification last November that the United States was 'the world's best hope.' The sole chance for a speedy and lasting settlement lay in the sincere acceptance by the warring powers of the principles which President Wilson had set forth and which his opponents had tacitly or openly approved. But hardly was the ink dry upon the armistice when those principles were denounced by Senators in a way which notified every greedy and reactionary imperialist in Europe that Mr. Wilson no longer had the united support of his country. The victors needed the solid influence of this great and disinterested Nation to save them from their worse selves; the wreckers in the Senate set themselves deliberately to destroy or weaken the influence of their country in the world's councils. It is not that spirit which can make the United States 'the world's best hope.'

"Something can still be saved from the wreckage. The treaty of Versailles may be in some respects bad, and if the Senate continues to fumble helplessly while the prestige and authority of the peace conference wane, the remaining treaties may be worse. But they all have a saving grace; they all explicitly recognize principles hitherto ignored in treaty making. Out of the wreckage one hopeful thing emerges in the unfinished scaffolding of a league of nations. Perfect it is not, but it is a beginning, and the fate of that beginning rests in great part, perhaps mainly, with the United States. The time has come for the United States to be something more than the palladium of liberty which Senator LODGE so finely praises; to be the world's best hope it must be the world's present help."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is that the last one for the day?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. I will find some more for the Senator after a while.

Mr. SMOOT. That is very nice.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has been in session now for about four hours, and I think it is time that the Senate took up the oil bill for consideration. At this time I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to get this amendment in at this time, if the Senator will yield for just a moment. I do not think it will take a moment's time.

On page 16, line 4, after the word "area," I move to insert "but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 4, after the word "area," it is proposed to insert the words "but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want to interfere with the progress of the leasing bill that is now before the Senate; but the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee [Mr. CUMMINS] a little while ago presented to the Senate a bill of transcendent importance, which represents the best judgment of the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce concerning the railroad problem in this country. The able Senator from Iowa has given a pretty complete résumé of the principal provisions of the bill. I do not care to dwell upon any of those features save and except one.

In the drafting of this bill the subcommittee felt that it was just to the employees that they should have a representation upon the board of directors as well as upon the committees of each of the railroad corporations. I think we have provided amply for their wage and the method of securing better laboring conditions; but we felt that we ought, in the interest of the public, to go a little further than any legislation which has heretofore been passed by the Congress. The task before this committee was perhaps as difficult as any one of a domestic nature that ever has been presented to the Congress of the United States. Among the grave questions presented for solution was this: What, if anything, shall be done toward preventing the tying up of the interstate commerce of the country on account of disputes arising between the employers and the employees?

The Federal statutes provide for the settlement of such disputes, methods of mediation, conciliation, and arbitration; but where these fail, what shall be done? Of course, any legislation bearing upon this subject should have for its first object the public good. At the same time it should be fair both to employee and to employer.

The plan submitted by the committee in substance provides, for the settlement of disputes not adjusted under existing provisions of law or otherwise, for a committee of wages and working conditions composed of eight members, four of whom shall represent labor and four of whom shall represent the railroad corporations. The members representing the employees shall be appointed, by the transportation board provided for in the bill, from among candidates nominated by the railroad crafts, and it shall appoint the members representing the carriers from candidates nominated by the railroad corporations. This committee is authorized to consider all complaints submitted by representatives of the employees or carriers and to make decisions by a majority vote. This decision is subject to approval by the transportation board. If the decision of the committee on wages and working conditions is evenly divided, then the matter in dispute is referred to the board, whose decision shall be final. If a carrier or any officer of any carrier refuses to obey the decision thus made, it or he, as the case may be, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject to a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both.

If two or more persons enter into any combination or agreement with the intent substantially to hinder, restrain, or prevent the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, or enter into any combination or agreement which substantially hinders, restrains, or prevents the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce, such persons shall be guilty of a conspiracy and be punished by a fine not exceeding $500, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment. It is especially provided, however, that nothing in this act shall be taken to deny to any individual the right to quit his employment for any reason.

The subcommittee realizes very fully the gravity of this legislation, but they believe that the situation is such as to require the Congress to provide against the possible tying up of the commerce of the country, thereby leading perhaps to evils as bad as if not worse than the war through which we have just passed.

It will be borne in mind that very recently threats were made that if certain increases in wages were not granted there would be a nation-wide strike on the railroads and in the shops affiliated or connected with the maintenance and operation of the railroads. Should such a strike be called and the railroad service suspended, within one week the people in the centers of population would be starved and in winter frozen. Such a situation means that the abundance of food products in the rural districts would waste upon the farms, while the people in the cities would be suffering because of their want; and this distress would not only be visited upon the rich and the poor, the high and the lowly, the employer and the employee, the union man and the nonunion man, but all of them would suffer alike, including the families of those who brought on the cessation of transportation. It would mean that the raw material could not be moved to the factories or the finished product from the factories to the consumers.

As an American citizen and as a Senator from a sovereign State, I submit that this is too great a power to be permitted to lodge with any man or set of men, no matter what his or their sphere of life. It is a power which the Congress of the United States would not lodge with even the President of the United States during peace, and if it can not be lodged with the Chief Executive of the United States, who is presumed to represent the whole people, it can not be—it ought not to be—lodged with any man or set of men who answer only to their craft, regardless of the consequences to the families of that craft or to the public at large, under any pretext whatsoever.

Before proceeding further I desire to say that regrettable as strikes are at any time I would not deprive of that right the employees in mine or in factory or in any activity of life which is local or intrastate in character. I realize that it sometimes happens that either the employer or the employees may become utterly unamenable to reason and insensible to their duties or the rights of others. Strikes which are local in character differ radically from those that pertain to interstate commerce and are nation-wide in their scope.

I submit that after the Congress shall have provided, as it already has, for processes of mediation and conciliation and arbitration, and as it will, if the pending bill becomes a law, provide for investigation and decision by an impartial committee on wages and working conditions, with a final decision by a transportation board, it is impossible to conceive that the demands of either party to such a dispute should be of higher importance to either disputant than is the adjustment of such dispute to the public, which includes both parties to the dispute.

Everyone realizes the feeling of unrest that pervades the country—aye, the world—due to the awful war through which we have just passed. Wages are high, and the cost of living, it seems, higher. My belief is that with rare exceptions the railway employees are as well paid if not better paid than the best-paid men in other activities of industrial life. It may be there should be some increases; I do not know.

The Government is now engaged in a campaign to reduce prices of the necessaries of life. The suspension of transportation would serve only to cut down production and thereby increase prices, to the detriment of the entire country. More than that, it would throw out of work the producers themselves.

Let me call attention to another fact. In the few months following the declaration of a state of war more than 4,000,000 of our boys, the flower of the land, entered the military service of the country—over 2,000,000 of them in France along the battle line and 2,000,000 more in the camps ready to be taken to France when the order to go might be given. These 4,000,000 boys served their country for a little more than $30 per month. For the last eight months they have been gradually demobilized. The Army is melting away into the pursuits of peace. While they were thus serving their country for $30 a month the men who are now threatening the country with a nation-wide strike were receiving wages higher than they had ever received in their lives; and now, while the $30 soldier is seeking for his job, some of the highly paid men in the railway service and kindred branches of industry are threatening to stop the wheels of all industry and thereby prevent not only themselves from earning a good wage but our soldier and sailor boys from securing employment in order to support themselves and their dependents.

Lest I may be misunderstood, I again repeat I have no reference in what I say to strikes, either in mine or factory, which are local in character, and only refer to the transportation system, which is nation wide in its importance.

It is the function of government to govern, and when it fails to govern it fails in purpose. The welfare of the whole people is vastly more to be desired than the advance in wage of a single class, though I believe in good wages and good working conditions for all. When the people as a whole are prosperous the people of the classes are prosperous, and when we legislate for all we are legislating for the benefit of every individual.

I know of no sound reasoning, either in politics or in morals, which will permit 2,000,000 men engaged in moving interstate commerce to refuse to adjust their differences with their employers or to submit them to trial and decision before a properly constituted tribunal, and thereby bring distress, if not ruin, to the entire people.

SPEECH OF HON. W. BOURKE COCKRAN—POSITION OF IRELAND.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a speech made by Hon. W. Bourke Cockran before the Committee on Foreign Relations on behalf of Ireland.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF IRELAND'S POSITION.

"Judge COHALAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to present the last speaker of the hearing. I want to say first a word of thanks, and to reserve the right for filing statements, which you gave some time ago, from a great many people from different parts of the country. I shall not take up further time now, except to present one of the foremost men of the country and of the Irish race, a scholar, a student of affairs, a statesman, and an orator, Hon. William Bourke Cockran, of New York.

"Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman and Senators, I would like to begin by answering some questions that were propounded to-day through the gentlemen who appeared before the committee in opposition to this proposed league of nations. One of the most important was that of Senator BORAH, who asked if it were true, as some gentlemen contended on the floor of the Senate, that if this league of nations be established it would prove a very effective agency through which Ireland could obtain her independence. I take it that Senator BRANDEGEE's question was put in amplification of that, because he said Senator WALSH made practically the same statement on the floor of the Senate.

"Senator BRANDEGEE. I did ask such a question, but I did not know that Senator BORAH had previously asked it.

ONLY AVENUE OF HOPE CUT OFF.

"Mr. COCKRAN. Therefore I shall answer both together. I think that Senator WALSH supplied the answer to his own question most effectively. He said there were three means by which subject nations could effect their independence. One was by the consent of the governing nation, another was by the action of the people themselves, and the third was by outside intervention, and he claimed great credit for the league of nations because it prohibited but one of those methods of relief, leaving the other two open. The objection to that in point of fullness and adequacy of remedy is that no nation ever did achieve its independence by the grant of the overruling power or by the action of its own people. Every successful revolution of which I have any knowledge was effected through the agency of outside support. This country would not have been free but for the intervention of France. Cuba would not have been free but for the intervention of this country, and Greece would still be languishing under the heel of the Turk if it had not been for the intervention of Christendom. So that when Senator WALSH says that we are deprived of one avenue of escape, the answer is that we are deprived of the only one through which escape can be effected.

ADMINISTRATION OF LAW IN IRELAND.

"There is another question which Senator BRANDEGEE asked which I think ought to be answered, and that was with reference to the administration of law in Ireland. At this time there is practically martial law, or what is called defense of the realm, which means no law at all. Everybody understands that martial law is the suspension of law. It is the substitution of law, which is a regular rule of conduct, and the replacing of it by the whim of judgment of the commanding officer, whoever he may be in the neighborhood. In Ireland under the present system we have two whims, either one of which constitutes t rule of conduct for the population. One is the whim of the commanding officer and the other is the judgment of the so-called resident magistrate—called resident magistrate for the reason that he is not a resident, apparently. All magistrates that are effective are always chosen from the neighborhood in which the laws are administered. The peculiarity of this so-called resident magistrate is that he never resides in the district; that he is always sent from outside, the basis of his selection and the reason for it being avowedly that he will not know anybody in the district, and, therefore, will not be subject to public opinion. But more than that, he is described as the arran, and although that is intended to describe him as the resident magistrate, it describes him more correctly as the removable magistrate. He is the only magistrate under the whole British system who is removable at the pleasure of the Crown. I need not remind the chairman of this body that the chief fruit that was gained by the revolution of 1688 was the termination of the system under which judges were removable by the Crown, and under which they became, in the language of Lord Macaulay, not champions to defend truth and justice, but greedy butchers to satisfy the appetite of hate and of despotism.

"The removal of that system is what the English people avowedly boast of in their rejoicings in the successful revolution of 1688, a system which they have established permanently in Ireland and through which the law is administered to-day. The effect is that if a man makes a speech, as Mr. WALSH said, advocating the republic he is promptly haled before either a drumhead court-martial or one of these resident magistrates, without any chance of appeal, committed to the hideous indignities which have been described so forcibly here to-day.

CUBA'S CASE PARALLEL.

"When conditions somewhat similar, though I do not think quite so onerous, existed in Cuba the chairman of this committee, and many other members, I think, here, were quick to raise the cry that intervention in Cuba became a task imposed upon us by our primacy of civilization; that the continuance of a government perverted from its natural functions of defending peace and order to perpetrating the very indignities that a government is organized to prevent was an injury to civilization which all the forces of civilization should combine to remove; and we, as the chief amongst those forces, drew the sword and ended that abominable system in Cuba. A worse system exists to-day in Ireland. It can be terminated, so far as we see now, by no means except the influence of the American Republic, and we are here to protest against any treaty, league of nations, or whatever it may be called, that will remove the consideration of the condition of Ireland from the jurisdiction of the conscience of Christendom. That has been the effective agency through which the oppressed nations have always effected their liberty.

"I pause for a moment to say that if there be any other Senator who wishes to ask any question concerning the character of the present government in Ireland, I would be very glad to answer him. If nobody cares to put that question, I shall proceed to discuss the question purely from an American standpoint.

"These gentlemen who preceded me have all said with great force and feeling that while they were of the Irish race they were of American birth; that they loved the country in which they were born. I say, for my part, that I am an Irishman by birth as well as by blood, and the reason I am here is that I do not want the Government which I sought, the system which I valued in my childhood, and which when I reached manhood was my first act to obtain the benefit of, destroyed, not alone for me, for my race is well-nigh run, but destroyed for all generations to follow. The light that inspired me, and millions like me, and guided our footsteps across the sea, I hope will not be extinguished, not merely for us but for all the children of men throughout the world.

QUESTION AFFECTS THE WORLD'S WELFARE.

"Mr. Chairman, this Irish question as we present it to you here, and as it is presented in this memorial, is not an Irish question; it is not a domestic question, but it is a question affecting the welfare and the peace of the world. As Judge Cohalan told you, there can be no peace throughout the world until the Irish discontent is composed. Many will say that is a mere expression of exaggerated rhetoric. It is a cold, sober, accurate statement of a fact that all history attests. It is a fact that every great war which has become general—and nearly every one has become general by England's entrance into it—that has scourged the world for the last four centuries—that is to say, since the emergence of modern civilization from the old dominion of feudalism—has had its beginning in Ireland, every one, without exception.

"This last war, which has just been closed, we all know was caused by the belief of the German Emperor that civil commotions in Ireland made 1914 the period when he could strike the blow for world dominion with the strongest hope of success. The great wars of the French Revolution began with the representation of those united Irishmen of Wolfe Tone to the directorate in France that the conditions that prevailed in that island, brought about by the deliberate withdrawal of Lord Fitzwilliam and the refusal of the concessions which had been promised to the Irish people, made the land ripe for rebellion; and when Hush was blown out of Bantry Bay in 1796, that was the incident which forced England into the coalition and afterwards ravaged Europe for 30 years. At the close of the seventeenth century it was the resolution of the Irish people to support James II in his attempts to retain the English throne which brought around the intervention of Louis XIV and led to that subsequent grand alliance against him which raged until it was settled by the peace of Utrecht. The war between Philip and Elizabeth—that war for the control of the seas—began with the dissenting Spanish and Portuguese soldiers on the coast of Calais, who were subsequently massacred to a man after the surrender by Sir Walter Raleigh—the only stain on the escutcheon of that ornament of Elizabethan chivalry.

THE IRISH QUESTION IS MISUNDERSTOOD.

"Why is it that every great war, if not exactly caused by Irish discontent, has yet made Ireland the theater of its first beginnings? There can not be a mere fortuitous connection between these two, there must be cause and effect, and my object is to show that the condition of Ireland has been a constant invitation to every person with a grievance against England to strike her at that spot where she was believed to be vulnerable and where she will continue to be vulnerable just so long as conditions against which the Irish people have protested for eight centuries are suffered to continue. So that the Irish question and its composition is not a matter that affects England and Ireland alone and one which therefore can be called domestic. It is one that has affected the peace of the world for four centuries, and which will continue to affect it, in the very nature of things, so long as it is permitted to remain an open sore in the side of Christian civilization.

"I think I may say with perfect moderation that the one great difficulty in dealing with the Irish question is to understand just what it is. It has been so misrepresented, and by the greatest masters of ingenuity that the world has ever seen, that we are oftentimes in doubt as to just what it is that causes the Irish complaint. What is it that makes this unrest? We are told that other countries have been conquered as Ireland has been, and we are told that Irish grievances are fanciful, that they are recollections of ancient injuries, ancient laws, which have long since been repealed. We are told that Belfast and Ulster are prosperous and contented and that the rest of Ireland is discontented and poor because its people are improvident, shiftless, and idle, and that at the basis and source of this demand for Irish independence is the purpose of an impoverished, thriftless, idle Irish majority to obtain the power of taxation over a thrifty and prosperous Irish minority.

"It is also said that there is a religious question involved, in that it represents the intolerance of one religious sect against another, the disposition of the Catholic to oppress and drive the Protestant from the land. That is stated in the brief submitted on this question, and is there set out as fully as it is in any discussions to which you have listened. If that be true to any extent, then I think the cause of Ireland is scarcely worth discussing. If Ireland has been reduced to its present condition of social misery by any fault of its own people, I do not think that this committee should concern itself with their future. If they are of the disposition that its critics describe, the proper thing to do with them is to let them die of starvation, let them disappear from the earth which they encumber and discredit, but if their condition be the direct result of laws which have produced conditions that still exist, although the laws themselves have been repealed, and if it be true that England has shown that she is incapable of doing justice in Ireland, even when a majority of her Parliament is resolved upon it, then there can be but one outcome. Either English rule in Ireland must be ended or the Irish people must be exterminated. That is the alternative, and I think it is quite capable of demonstration.

IRISH PEOPLE HAVE WONDERFULLY SURVIVED.

"Let me explain to you why it is that although these oppressive laws have all been repealed, the conditions they produce still continue. All the history of Ireland ever since the Norman invasion has been the history of conquests, confiscation of land—first devastation of land and then confiscation afterwards. From the first conquest of Strong Bow in 1172 down to the final overthrow of Irish independence at the Battle of the Boyne and by the fall of Limerick in the reign of William III, after each invasion and devastation, the Irish people recovered their prosperity with a celerity and completeness that have been the marvel of all historians.

"Mountjoy, under Elizabeth, reported to the queen that everything capable of supporting life in Ireland had been burned to the ground; that the whole Irish population had been exterminated, except a few that had taken refuge in morasses where they could not be reached, and where, for the lack of food, they must starve, and yet in the very next reign Ireland was blooming like a garden. In the time of Charles I the prosperity of Ireland had already awakened the envy of Englishmen, but the Irish, with that peculiar sense of loyalty, misdirected because carried to extreme, having embraced the side of the king, fell under the vengeance of Cromwell, and again the island was devastated, and the whole of the land east of the Shannon was confiscated. The entire population was sent west of the Shannon, to a soil which was believed to be so sterile that it could not afford subsistence to human life. Cromwell's brief account of his policy was: 'The Irish people should go to hell or to Connaught.' Well, they went to Connaught, but they did not go to hell, because in some way or other there was always one Irish foe that British arms could never overcome, and that was the Irish girl. Any Englishman who received land and got quarter in Ireland soon fell under her influence. That was apparent in the time of Richard II when he passed the statute of Kilkenny, which forbade an Englishman who had received lands in Ireland from marrying an Irish woman, but the Irish girl was too strong for statutes, and she continued to marry the English, and the offspring of those marriages were the strongest Irish patriots in the world.

REGAINED COMMERCIAL SUPREMACY.

"So that after the plowshare had practically passed from the land, after everything considered valuable was practically consumed by fire and sword, the son of William in the next generation faced a hostile Irish army, a large part of it composed of the sons of Cromwell's Ironsides who had been quartered in Ireland. After that devastation by crime in the reign of Charles II, Macaulay says the recovery of Ireland is the marvel of all history. It is now established, even by Froude, who will not be suspected of any partiality toward Ireland, that in the reign of Charles II the entire transportation of goods by sea from the Old World to the New was practically carried on in Irish bottoms. Irish cattle and horses commanded the highest prices in the English market, and the Irish woolen products were the very finest in all the world.

"Immediately after the accession of this king, for whose father Ireland had incurred the resentment and fury of Cromwell, his first step in obedience to the remonstrances of the merchants of Bristol was to exempt Ireland from the navigation act, the effect of which was that nobody could transport goods in Irish bottoms. They must first go to England and then be transferred to an English bottom there. That absolutely destroyed the Irish shipping trade, from which it has never recovered.

"Next, by an order in council, for all of these were by orders in council, Irish exportation of cattle and horses to England was prohibited. That reduced the value of live stock to one-tenth of its former value, but the woolen industry remained, and probably from the fact that the energies of the country were now directed to it, the whole capital of the nation absorbed the woolen trade and it proceeded to such a degree that the woolen manufacture was unapproached by any product anywhere throughout the world. When William III finally established his authority first by arms at Okram and the Boyne, and afterwards by treason at Limerick by agreeing to terms of surrender which guaranteed to the Irish people the right to practice their faith, carry on their trade, and own property—a treaty that was violated the moment the garrison had departed from Ireland—then the system was adopted which Edmund Burke has described in words probably familiar to everyone here. He said the Irish penal code was as well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment, and degradation of a feeble people and the debasement in them of human nature itself as anything that had ever proceeded from the perverted ingenuity of man. This was the system that produced the conditions that to-day afflict and distress the Irish and which can be relieved only by ending the dominion of England.

HOW CHURCH LANDS WERE CONFISCATED.

"For 50 years a succession of statutes resulted in a body of laws under which no Catholic could hold land: First, all the land was seized. It was not bestowed, as in former cases, upon English soldiers who would settle in Ireland, but it was bestowed upon favorites of the English court in large blocks of 5,000 and 10,000 and 15,000 acres—favorites who had established their position with the sovereign not by services that were creditable but in many instances by services that could not be mentioned. They were English courtiers, who never lived in Ireland, who never visited it, who never intended to visit it. Every Catholic was prohibited from holding land. He could not hold a lease for a longer period than five years. He could not own a horse worth over £5, and if a Protestant met a Catholic riding a horse which he liked, all he had to do to get it was to tender him a £5 note. The system, to accomplish degradation, forbade education. The only element that was then equipped with education in the community was the clergy, and the priest who taught a school was guilty of capital offense and was hanged for it. In order to accomplish the degradation of the people they did not confine themselves to plunging the new generations into iguorance, but these statutes proceeded to undermine the morality of the family. The son could inform on the father, declare him to be a Catholic, and, on proving it, could immediately take possession of the estate. The wife could inform on the husband and at once was given a separate interest in it, independent of him.

RESULTS OF TOIL WERE MADE HOSTILE INSTRUMENTS.

"So that wifely loyalty and filial piety and every emotion which in civilized countries is considered necessary to the well-being of a community, the object of encouragement by the Government, were here perverted and endeavored to be destroyed and turned to the destruction of society itself. The practical operation of this was that the people never came in contact with the owners of the soil, but were left to the sweet and tender mercies of an agent. In every instance an agent represented the alien landowner. The value and efficiency of that agent were determined by the amount of rent that he could extort from the unfortunate occupants. If a man improved the soil and made it more valuable, the agent at once descended upon him and raised the rent. Not merely were the efforts of his labor confiscated, but the whole neighborhood beside were promptly informed that they could make their soil just as good as this particular man had, and they were warned that unless they raised the same amount of crops and paid the same rent they would be evicted to starve on the highway, because, by a refinement of cruelty that is almost incalculable, the only industry that survived the hostile legislation of Charles II, the woolen industry, was entirely destroyed and prohibited. Remember, it was not taxed out of existence; it was not made to bear burdens, prevented from being prosperous, but it was absolutey prohibited, and more than that, the wool, the Irish wool at that time, before the Australian supply became available for the world's necessities, was of a peculiarly valuable character. It was that quality that made the Irish woolen industry the most prosperous in the world. The exportation of that wool was prohibited to any place except six English cities, the idea being that the Irish farmer would be driven to sell his wool to the English manufacturer at his own terms, but there was a woolen industry in the lower countries, and a great demand arose for the Irish product.

RESULTS OF LIMITED TRADE LAWS.

"Wool that would bring 6 pence at Bristol would bring 1 and 7 pence in Ypres, or in any of the Flemish towns, and although the exportation was prohibited, it is needless to say that very soon a thriving and extensive smuggling business was started, and that is the beginning of that extensive smuggling the story of which forms so large a part of the eighteenth century Irish literature. But the worst feature of it was not the confiscation of money. It was this: Being contraband, it could not be carried on by open exchange and by means of the ordinary bills and banking facilities that governed commerce. It could only be carried on by barter for something that could not be discovered, for everywhere the Irish coast was patrolled by British officers charged with the duty of discovering smuggling, and preventing it where they could and punishing where it was accomplished. The only commodity for which the exchange could be effected that could easily disappear were the Flemish wines. That was the basis of the trade, and that was the beginning of the intemperance that has been the curse of your country and mine and your race and mine for 250 years. Before that period the Irish were a temperate race. From the fact that the Irish could obtain fine wines in exchange for their wool, there soon spread through the land, in order to supply the demand, the growth of the manufacture of illicit whisky, and the island sank further and further, steeped in that dreadful intoxication from which they have suffered both at home and abroad ever since. But we can say this, Mr. Chairman, if the curse of it has been Ireland's, the shame of it is England's.

RACE EXTERMINATION BECAME IMMINENT.

"I am not saying this on my own authority. Here, again, sir, I am quoting from James Anthony Froude, the apologist of the English excesses in Ireland, who, indeed, seems to complain that if these enormities had gone further the race would have been exterminated, and if their exploitation had been further permitted, it would have been to the condemnation of civilization, which we are invoking in this body, a body through which the highest purposes of civilization can be accomplished, the civil government of a people.

"These proscriptive laws gradually disappeared; and it is to the credit and to the glory of this country that the proscriptive religious laws disappeared early, so that fugitive Irishmen and Presbyterians who settled in Pennsylvania and the Catholics who had fled from other parts of Europe were found side by side under the banner of Washington for freedom, justice, and right. Up to that time religious proscriptions were not confined to Ireland. They were universal. They were part of the general policy of the world. They were based on the assumption that anything like diversity of religious faith weakened a State, and therefore should be prevented by the Government. The Huguenots were put under serious disabilities in France, the Catholics in England, but in Ireland the distinction was that the proscriptive measures were not intended merely to punish her people for Catholicism, but were intended to degrade the population by plunging them into ignorance and by corrupting every avenue through which virtue is reenforced and through which men are inspired through those virtues that are considered essential to the well-being of every State.

STUCK LOYALLY TO THEIR RELIGIOUS FAITH.

"The faith was proscribed in Ireland with a violence which can hardly be understood. And this must be borne in mind when you consider the Irish question, that it is the only country in the world that has stuck to a faith that has been proscribed. Every other country adopted the faith that had been enforced by its government. England became almost uniformly Protestant, or something or other, under Henry VIII, almost uniformly Catholic again under Queen Mary, Protestant again under Queen Elizabeth; and it was ready to make another change to Catholicism, as the historians say, if James II had but governed with a little more sense. But in Ireland the majority of the people stuck to the faith that was proscribed, though they had to sacrifice every hope of improving their condition. The extraordinary thing about that tenacity of purpose is that it was maintained in the face of every discouragement. Such a thing as a great ceremonial had not occurred in the country for 150 years. Their faith proscribed, they practiced their rites crouching in their houses, hiding in the glens. They were driven from the towns and they took refuge in some mountain glen, as French writers describe, and there under the broad canopy of heaven, with the rains descending upon them, offtimes knee deep in mud, with sentinels posted at each end of the glen to watch for the priest hunter, who was an established institution at the time, the contemporary writers say that they practiced their rites with a fervor never before shown by any race; and even when they regained the right to practice their faith, they were remarkable for the fact that they had so little regard for the ceremonials but they remained steadfast to their nationality and to their belief.

THEIR POETRY IS INSPIRED BY MELANCHOLY.

"Their poetry, which is perhaps the most melancholy in the world—and I am one of those that think that nearly all beautiful poetry is inspired by sorrow. I have never known any beautiful note to be inspired by prosperity. All their poetry is melancholy, it contains no hope of the future. But there is no note of despair in it. Everywhere is the declaration that they will stick to the old sod, the old faith, and the old race, though they never again should see the light of freedom.

"Freedom now so seldom speaks.
The only time she speaks
Is when some heart indignant breaks
To show that still she lives.

"She has lived in the hearts of Irishmen under all circumstances under the darkest skies without any hope of deliverance; lived because freedom, though it was denied to them as a possession, was an aspiration from which they never could be separated. That is a people that can not be disturbed. That is a people that can not be subdued, and therefore, Senators, I come to submit to you with all frankness, with confidence, that the only alternative which the Irish question presents is extermination of the people or emancipation. You, the chief agency of civilization; you, the Senators, members of this body that embodies the very highest development of government, which is at once the product and the bulwark of our civilization, you will not suffer the destruction of a race like this; and if you will not suffer it to be destroyed, then you must insist that it be free. There is no alternative. [Applause.]

STOOD EVER FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

"Now, with respect to the religious question, there is a religious prejudice in Ireland and there has been a multitude of religious antagonisms, but whenever the Irish obtained possession of their country, as they did at intervals in 1642 and again in 1688, the first act of the emancipated Catholics was to declare absolute religious freedom. The reason why these so-called religious antagonisms exist is because religion was made the test of political rights and essential rights. A man could be ousted of his property because he was a Catholic, and the strongest properties some man, bound to him by the closest ties of kinship or a total stranger, could come and take possession of, and it was natural that he associated with that religion the spoilation of which he was the victim.

"But I should add also here, in order to explain why Belfast and Ulster were prosperous while the rest of the country sunk steadily deeper and deeper into misery, that a totally different system of laws prevailed in the two places. In Ulster a man was a tenant by right, so that the occupant of the soil could till it with the certainty that every improvement he made was his, and would be assured to him by law; and the linen trade, which used to be a stable industry, was always protected and not suppressed as the woolen trade was.

"So the difference between Ulster and the rest of the country was that in Ulster normal progress was made by the people under the stimulus of production; and she was able to do it because she was able to enjoy the benefit of civilized law, while the rest of the country was driven from every avenue of industry under the conditions which those laws established.

ONLY HOPE WAS IN TILLING THE SOIL.

"As I have said, the man that cultivated the soil lost not merely the benefit of his labor, but he brought down upon all his neighbors the agent with fresh demands from the landlord. And when these people were dispossessed, they were doomed to death, because there was no other industry left in the island. Everything else was suppressed in the island, the shipping industry and the woolen industry. There was nothing but agriculture; and the only hope of the man under these conditions was that he might hold some of his property under some conditions or other; and if he did not, he must die.

"Now, there was a period that Mr. Walsh has mentioned, from 1782 to 1800, when the Irish Parliament restored to those people their land, a period of the fullest prosperity, for the reason that the owners of the soil had an interest in living upon the land, and they let them remain living upon it. They were quick to realize the necessities of the people who by living upon the land became their judges and their wards.

"It is said that Ireland had exactly the same law as England with respect to land. Quite true, but the English enforcement of the laws was just as different as it is possible to conceive. The English landlord always lived upon his estate. He was the chief of an industrial family. He felt himself charged with the welfare of every person that lived upon it, and I know of nothing more impressive in the whole history of England than the manner in which these lords of the soil exercised their power over it for the benefit of the people who occupied it and for the glory of their country. Never was he off the job. Even in his amusements he was carrying out his duty and effecting his purpose. We often hear of the claret-drinking, fox-hunting squire, as though he spent his life in drinking port wine and claret and hunting foxes; and he did spend a good part of his time in these delightful occupations. [Laughter.] But when he was hunting over his own fields and those of his neighbors, he was scrutinizing his fences and the condition of his tenants' cottages, and comparing them with the conditions existing on the lands of the other landowners. When he was shooting, probably he was not conscious of anything except his desire to kill partridges and snipe; but as he shot partridges he had to wander through the stubble in which they were concealed, and there he was constantly reminded of the manner in which the agriculture was carried on by his tenants. If fences decayed, agriculture was not efficient; if houses were dropping into ruin, he asked the tenant why it was so—why it was that he did not keep them up. If the tenant would say to him, 'I can not do it and pay this rent,' he replied, 'You did it before.' 'I have five children now. I did not have those children when I was paying that rent.'

TENANCY DIFFERED WIDELY IN ENGLAND AND IRELAND.

"So, if the landlord undertook to evict the man under conditions like that, he would suffer so in the respect of his neighbors that he would not be much better than if he had committed a crime; and so while the technical power that remained in the English landlord was as great as that which remained in the Irish landlord, public opinion prevented his using it and made him a trustee for the benefit of those who were in communion with him. And that man, Mr. Chairman—and I am speaking now of instances within my own knowledge—who in England would be the very embodiment of fatherly paternal care for his tenants, would administer an Irish estate with such ruthless cruelty that it is difficult for us here to conceive that such conditions could obtain in a civilized country.

"I know one man myself, who is still living and who occupies a very prominent position to-day in English public life; the younger son of a great naval officer, who acquired when he came of age a little property of a thousand pounds a year. He went on the turf, and in the course of a couple of weeks the thousand pounds passed from his pockets into those of the enterprising bookmakers, and as was the case with the Irish landlords living apart, he wrote a letter to his agent asking if he could not get more money, and the agent said that he could double his income. 'Then why the mischief do you not do it?' 'I wanted to be sure that I would be sustained.' Now, this man is a very level-headed person, quite an extraordinary man, and he thought it was very strange; that there must be something that needed explanation; so he walked over to this estate, which he had never seen, and saw his agent, who took him over the property, and he saw the various places, and the agent said, 'Now, there is one place that could easily be doubled, another place 25 per cent; and this,' said he, 'is one of the best farms in the place, worth 2 guineas an acre, and an old man rents it for 2 and 6 pence.'

THE EXAMPLE OF SIR CHARLES BERESFORD.

"The agent said they had sometimes raised the rentals and had not always been sustained by their principals. The landlord's name is Sir Charles Beresford. He had developed from his early service in the navy the habit when anything went wrong of going to see what it was himself. If an engine went out of order he never sent the engineer to find out, but went and found it out himself. So he thought he would quietly go down and see the occupant of his farm, whose name I think was Monahan. He entered the cottage door and was welcomed. They do not ask who any person is, but any one who goes by is entitled to open the door and sit down to a meal if a meal is in progress. There was no meal in progress at this time. He began to converse with Mr. Monahan on the excellence of his farm. The moment the Irishman received any congratulation on the farm he seemed to see a potential and probable rise of the rental, and when Sir Charles asked him how it happened that he only paid 2 and 6 pence for it the tenant asked, 'Why do you busy yourself about it?' 'Why, I am your landlord.' And thereupon this man, who was 70 years of age, broke down and wept like a child, and he said, 'My lord, do not take it from me. It is true I am paying 2 and 6 pence a quarter. But when I came here the land was not worth 6 pence, and the value it has to-day is the result of work for 40 years put into it by me and my boys.' Four grown sons of this man had helped him to effect this improvement. He said, 'I will give you half of it, but let me keep the rest.' Sir Charles said, 'No, Mr. Monahan; I am pretty hard up, but I would have to be much harder up before I would take away from you the work of a lifetime. Keep your farm at 2 and 6 pence as long as you live.'

"I suppose if he had not gone there he would not have been guilty of great cruelty on his part if he had been told by his agent that he could get twice as much, and the man and his four sons would have been put out on the road to die unless he could have gotten enough money to get a ship coming to America and come to this country. He could have come to this country and told his experience, and the American people hearing it, it would generate that public opinion through which this monstrous system of England is destined to perish.

FORCED TO COMPETE FOR POSSESSION OF SOIL.

"You ask, if these laws were obtained, how comes it that this condition existed. It was for the reason that it became a denial of capital. They came and went. The landlords removed their tenants at will under the conditions that I have described. The Irish people produced more commodities that were essential to support the population, twice as much, and yet they perished of hunger because they were compelled to compete against everyone else for the possession of the soil, and to obtain under such conditions their entire subsistence, which was confined to potatoes. They never tasted meat from one year to another; and when the potato crop failed, while in other countries it hardly created a ripple, in Ireland it created starvation. Great herds of cattle marched by the cottages where they were suffering from hunger, before their very eyes, and they could not touch them. The Irish people, they say, are not fit to govern themselves. But it was this exaggerated notion of property that restrained them. In any other country in the world those abundant supplies would have been seized, and the people would have used them, but the Irish, from their exaggerated idea of property, allowed themselves to perish of starvation before taking what belonged to the landlord.

"That condition is general, and the only alleviation has been by the Windham Act of 1902. That showed conclusively that if conditions were established in Ireland that would enable them to redeem their lands after their devastation, it would result in recreating a prosperity such as it would be difficult for us to conceive. Just consider what occurred under that act. Remember, the land was not taken back from the sellers and given to the occupiers, as it had been originally taken. It was taken from them at a high valuation, and after the high valuation had been fixed by mutual consent, 12 per cent was given to the sellers as a bonus. That was all charged upon the land. But the occupier was empowered to take possession of it and pay the total amount of the purchase price in installments extending over 62 years—I think that was the number of years. One-half of the land of Ireland passed into the possession or ownership of the occupier under that act. I think there were some 12,000 transactions. And now, what absolutely seems to transcend the possibilities of human nature so far as I know, there was not a single default in all of those agreements, and by 1914 the people of Ireland had already effected a wonderful revolution in their condition.

DOMESTIC CONDITIONS IMPROVED UNDER ADVERSE CONDITIONS.

"The cabins—the terrible cabins which I remember, in which we would not suffer a pig to exist to-day—had disappeared, where human beings, 9 and 10 in number, and animals if they were lucky enough to own a pig, dwelt together in the shelter of a few sods placed against an upright pole, with no protection from the weather and an open space at the top where smoke from turf and such articles as they could burn escaped. Cottages have replaced them, and implements of husbandry are kept, and I never saw better horses anywhere than in 1913 in parts of Ireland.

"They once more entered into the prosperity which they had enjoyed in 1782 to 1800, and the monuments of which are those wonderful buildings that decorate the city of Dublin, and that are the admiration of visitors from every part of the world that happen to see them.

"At this time the British Government undertook to promise a measure of home rule. The majority of the Irish people, as they were represented in Parliament, adopted it. I myself spent a whole afternoon with Balfour urging them to accept it. It was not a home-rule bill at all, but it was acceptable and afforded the best basis. It did not create a Parliament, but it proposed measures for the British Parliament. Certain subjects were relegated to the Irish Parliament, but the English Parliament had the power to set aside an act of the Irish Parliament and pass a different act, and the English act would prevail over the Irish enactment. But that was such a measure as the English could well afford to give, as it established a commission to propose laws, and the Irish and the English Government were willing to grant it. But a number of Ulsterites, encouraged by the politicians of England, banded together and declared a rebellion against the Government if the act were to go into force. Mr. Carson, who had been a high official of the Government, organized a provisional government—a government, as he said, in trust to maintain the authority of the British over the island—and one F. E. Smith, who was not an Irishman, who did not have a drop of Irish blood in his veins and who had no connection with the island, came over to Belfast and various places in Ulster and made arrangements to resist the act, aided by the ablest of the English politicians.

RESULTS OF THE EMBARGO AGAINST ARMS.

"At that time the Irish nationalists, who, mind you, at that time were supporting the English Government in England, which did not have a majority except by the vote of the Irish representatives, to sustain the act which the Government passed, organized a volunteer force. And then what happened? First, this Government, maintained by Irish votes, forbade the admission of arms into Ireland. But the Ulsterites had arms brought in from Germany. Mr. Carson had stated openly, and so had the other Ulster leaders, that they would, rather than suffer home rule, work under the authority of the Kaiser. The nationalists were not allowed to bring arms into Ireland. The Ulsterites disregarded that proclamation. They brought in arms undisturbed without any molestation. They considered it a joke. Gun running was considered a perfectly proper pursuit. When the armed forces appeared and shot down and killed women and children who were standing by quite a few Irish national volunteers started to get possession of arms. Everywhere sedition was preached. In Ulster loyalty was preached among the Irish national volunteers, and the Irish national volunteers were persecuted by the very men they kept in office.

"Under the new amendment to the British constitution it is possible now to pass an act over the objection of the House of Lords if enacted three times in the House of Commons. The bill had been enacted once, and the second enactment was going through and the military—not the volunteers, but the regular organized military of the great British camp—were notified that it was possible that violence in Ulster might require intervention of the military arm, and forthwith the chief officers all, with the exception of Gen. Padgett, resigned their commissions and announced that they would not draw their swords for their Government because it would be drawing them in behalf of the Irish rebels and against the Ulsterites, favorites of the Government.

IRISHMEN WENT LOYALLY TO THE COLORS.

"Can you wonder at what happened? The war came on, and Mr. Redmond, acting for the nationalists, declared the purpose of the Irish people to support the war. I think he made a capital mistake when he said that they would wait for the home-rule bill until after the war was over. When the enlistment came they went to the colors in great numbers. They asked that they be organized separately, so that deeds of valor would redound to the glory of the race, but the request was denied. They were mixed in with other regiments and companies, but the Irish were sent to the front in every place where the fortunes of war were desparate and the casualties were heavy. They have suffered more than any other branch of the English service, and they did not get any credit for it.

"Well, the volunteers withdrew, and suddenly it was announced that it was resolved by the British Government that the nationalists who had been supporting the Government would be arrested, and that the few arms they had would be seized; that on Easter Sunday led to the riots, when some 17 men were shot down, and these men were the very flower of Irishmen.

SECTIONALISM WAS BRED AND FOSTERED.

"Now, the fundamental impossibility of England doing justice in Ireland is shown by that simple narrative of facts which are within the memory of us all. The insuperable difficulty is that for 200 years the legislation for Ireland has proceeded on the assumption that the Ulsterite was a superior being, and that the other Irishman was an inferior being. You can not very well wonder at that, because you can not very well rob a man and then admit that he is your equal, or that he is a good man. You must insult him at the same time that you despoil him, in order to justify the spoliation. So it became the burden of English representation concerning Ireland that the Irishmen were a shiftless, worthless, thriftless race, unworthy of consideration, and that the Ulsterites, who had opportunities of industry that the rest of Ireland sought in vain, were a superior race, and that therefore they must be treated on a totally different basis. You can not explain that different treatment of these two sections in any other way. It was not Tory Englishmen who did this. It was liberal Englishmen who did it. It was Englishmen who were kept in office by Irish votes, and it merely shows that England can not do justice in Ireland; that when she tries to do it she is incapable of doing it. I believe the majority of the English people were anxious to do justice by Ireland in 1914 and 1915, but that there are forces in England too strong to permit justice to be done to Ireland.

BUT ONE INEVITABLE OUTCOME FOR IRELAND.

"And now, to come to the point, there is but one outcome. Ireland must be released from this incubus. She can not continue to exist under it. She will not. She would not deserve to if she accepted these conditions of degradation, and she will not accept them. Her whole history shows that. All the leagues of nations on the earth will not keep Ireland submissive to this wrong, thank God for it. [Applause.] In saying that for Ireland I think I can say it for Americans, too. [Applause.] I do not believe all the powers on earth, arrayed in a league of nations or otherwise, could keep America submissive under a wrong. [Applause.] I do not believe there is any chance that America will be reduced to the test where her people must revolt against her Government in order that justice may remain their portion. I am as certain as I can be that this measure will be defeated, root and branch, as an abomination which the American people can not take to their bosoms. There is but one thing necessary here to effect the emancipation of Ireland and the regeneration of the world, and it is that we acknowledge and recognize the simplicities of the situation which the war has created, as Senator KNOX described them yesterday, and govern our course by this infallible guide. What is it that the world needs? We all say peace. Of course it is. What is peace?

"Why, peace is not merely the removal of arms from the field, but it means a deliverance from the preoccupation and obsession of preparation for war. For long before we declared war we were practically in a state of war. We were paying the price of war. Owing to the increase of armaments the great increase of production instead of bringing prices down was steadily sending the cost of living upward, and that could be accounted for on no basis except the waste that was created by the necessity for supporting 5,000,000 of men in the very flower of their productive efficiency, idle in barracks, and equipping them with the means of support and the weapons which would make them effective. That was a terrible burden upon the world before the war. To-day it is a burden that would destroy or at least seriously imperil the future solvency of the world. Remember that during the hundred of years of peace there was an enormous increase in population, but that that increase was confined also entirely to the cities. Rural populations declined rather than increased, and in all those cities there is not a single human being who produces the necessities of his own exstence. Five or six millions of people established themselves on the Hudson River and the East River, and there they have lived on the contributions of the workers of all the world. Everything that enters into their industry must come from outside, and anybody who has ever looked upon those great chimneys and seen the smoke of manufacture rising to the heavens, the incense which industry burns before the throne of God, must realize the close interdependence between all the human beings of the world to-day. Everything that enters into manufacture, the very stones of the structure in which industry works, the very beams of the building in which it is sheltered, all come from outside. The worker in the cities depends upon the labor of all the world.

INDEPENDENCE WILL AID THE SOLUTION OF GREAT PROBLEMS.

"Now, before the war 4,000,000 of those 5,000,000 people lived literally from hand to mouth, and the same proportion held good in all the other great cities that have sprung up throughout the world under the stimulus of that long peace lasting over a hundred years. To-day $250,000,000,000 of capital, by which this industry is made effective, has perished. Ten million human beings are dead. Now, how is industry to be made efficient? How are these mighty populations to exist? There is but one way. The waste of war and the preparations for war must be ended. If we have universal disarmament, then this war will turn from the greatest scourge ever laid upon the backs of the human race into the greatest blessing which a merciful Providence has ever extended to them. The French Revolution resulted in displacing the old system of feudalism which had controlled industry. The setting free of industry throughout the world led to that enormous development which has been the wonder of mankind. During the last hundred years the whole aspect of the human family has been so changed that when you consider its condition as it has become, and compare it with any previous period of the world's history, it almost seems as though we were talking of two different planets inhabited by wholly different beings.

"The powers of production have been increased so enormously, conditions have been improved so, that it is simply impossible to consider human life to-day as equivalent to what it was 100 years ago.

"And after our Civil War, notwithstanding its enormous waste, the substitution of free labor for slave labor opened a fountain of prosperity which more than supplied in five years the terrible destruction of battle. And now, if we can put all the energies of mankind into production, if we can take weapons wholly from the hands of men and place in them nothing but the implements of toil, the ravages of this war will be repaired in five years, and the human family will, I think, be able to live on six hours' labor a day. Not that I think man will want to or ought to, but I think that the moment the necessity for long hours of labor is removed, then the love of labor inherent in every human being will make men as anxious to work for the credit of production as soldiers are anxious to fight for the credit they will gain from destruction. That is the future of the human family to which we can look forward, provided the fruits of this war are garnered for peace and justice. The world is at the parting of the ways. Either we are going to take the path which will lead to a prosperity that is immeasurable or else we will sink down through confusion and disaster to ruin that is irretrievable. Which shall we choose? Mr. Chairman, if we follow the path marked by this league of nations, and this attempt by a new covenant to perpetuate the conditions from which we hoped this war would deliver us all, if we increase armaments instead of abolishing them, this league of nations, which is a league not to create peace but to prohibit peace, as Senator KNOX has well said, will prove to be a curse and not a blessing, and in that event I believe there is no future for the human family. [Applause.]

SENATE IS FULLY ABREAST OF ITS TRADITIONS.

"But I have not the slightest apprehension. Thank God, there is here in this Senate the spirit which will deliver this country from the peril that threatens it and dispel from the horizon of humanity the cloud which darkens it. I think I may say with perfect confidence and perfect truth that since this treaty was laid upon the table of the Senate a wealth of discussion has ensued which has raised the standard of its proceedings to a plane higher than ever before attained in its history. [Applause.] I can quote speeches now, delivered by men who sit around me, that have no parallel in anything delivered in the Senate before the war, and I do not even except that much-lauded reply of Daniel Webster to Senator Hayne, of South Carolina. When we consider the wealth of information, the high spirit of patriotism, the stern resolution to do justice in the teeth of misrepresentation, I think that all the addresses delivered in the past which were sure of applause from the section whose views were represented sink and pale into comparative insignificance.

"America has accomplished the greatest things ever achieved in the history of mankind, things which have been so universally recognized as of transcendent value to the human family that if they could be changed to-day no human being would voluntarily disturb them, and if anybody who had the power to disturb them should attempt it the whole conscience of Christendom would rally to preserve them as priceless possessions of the whole human family. Yet these great accomplishments were attained, not through the politicians and statesmen, but largely in spite of them. The people have always done better than the politicians or statesmen had indicated. Surely if we look back, this war, which we can all see now was absolutely essential to the preservation of our civilization, was not the free choice of the President who waged it. He went into a campaign and sought reelection, in perfect sincerity as I believe, upon the proposition that he had kept us out of war. He could not have intended to go into war when he called the extra session, because he did it only after the failure of a measure which did not look toward war, but merely for the arming of merchant ships.

WARS AND TREATIES OF THE PAST.

"The war with Spain was forced upon a reluctant Executive, as I think the chairman of this committee will admit, close as he was to the administration of that very, very distinguished President.

"The composition of the Civil War was not what anybody suggested. Looking back at it now, if either party had had its way the country would not yet have recovered from its ravages. I remember when Mr. Tilden was, I believed at the time—and I have not wholly changed my opinion—cheated of the office to which he had been elected, I thought it was the end of this Government. I thought that the South would remain under the cruel heel of oppression, with two governments in three different States, and that the possibility of final reconstruction or reconciliation had faded away into the distance. Looking back now, I can see that it was the providence of God that put the task of withdrawing the Federal troops from South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida into the hands of a Republican President, and thus made it the common policy of the whole country, which Democrats were delighted to welcome and which Republicans were not in a position to criticize.

"I look back to the War of 1812, which was forced on President Madison. Senator KNOX, who has undoubtedly studied closely the archives of the State Department, knows that the purchase of Louisiana as we understand it was never contemplated by Thomas Jefferson. It was forced on him, and the great territory north of the present bounds of Louisiana was regarded as a handicap by some and as a reason for rejecting the treaty by others, on the ground that it never could be of any value to us. But the people builded wiser than the statesmen through all those years.

IS AMERICA'S HOPE IN THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS?

"And now, when the greatest emergency that has ever confronted the country is upon us, I believe that the people's conscience, the people's voice, the people's judgment, and the people's wisdom will prove higher and greater than that of any member of the populace itself; but I do thank God that here in the Senate there is still the spirit of patriotism that has checked, and I believe will stop, this attempt to betray the causes and purposes for which this war was fought. I do not charge this as deliberate treason at all, but I do say it will be the net result if the purposes of those who negotiated this treaty shall be accomplished. What is the reason for this treaty? Can we find anything in it that anybody praises? The league of nations is imperfect by the concession of everybody. Shantung is an abomination. Yet we are told that we must yield to this abomination and make ourselves party to it. My God, when did it come to pass that the word 'must' can be applied to the American Nation? [Applause.] When this Nation consisted of a few villages along the Atlantic coast, the suggestion was made that they could obtain the forbearance of the greatest military power in the world at the time by a substantial advance of money. The answer was given without an instant's hesitation: 'Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute!' [Applause.]

"And, sir, are we now to pay, not a tribute of money but a tribute of infamy, by the confession of everybody, in order to establish a league which has not and can not operate for peace, but in the very nature of things, as was conclusively shown, must operate to make war, constant and frequent, if not perpetual? Is there in that treaty one single word of which anybody should be proud? Does it emancipate a single people who seek emancipation, except as an act of vengeance against the countries that were overthrown? Does it hold out a word of hope to nations that are languishing in chains and determined to break them? Far from that, it creates new spoliations and makes us a party to them, without whom it is doubtful if those spoliations could become effective. [Applause.]

THE UNITED STATES WILL NOT BE CONTEMPTIBLE.

"But we are told that, of course, we can pass a resolution declaring we do not like it at the very same time that we are doing it. Now, I can have some respect, or at least I can understand the attitude of a man who will accomplish an infamy because he wants to, but I have no patience with the man who stoops to make himself a party to an infamy which he dislikes and which he says he dislikes. [Applause.] One man is formidable to virtue, the other is contemptible to everyone. Thank God, the United States is not going to be contemptible. [Applause.]

"Now, in all this I do not intend the slightest reflection on the President of the United States. I think I ought to say that. [Laughter.] No; no. Now, Senators, let me say this to you: I think the place of the President in history is a high one, and I think it is secure. I think it is so secure that it can not be overthrown by anything except the success of his treaty. His explanation and definition of the causes of this war has become one of the priceless possessions of humanity. The 14 points are not dead. They are alive; they are here. [Applause.] We are appealing to them. They can never die.

"I was one of those who sincerely deplored his going abroad. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that the President of the United States is ever justified in placing his person under the jurisdiction or power of another Government, especially when he is engaged in a great act involving the sovereignty of the United States. They could coerce him in a thousand ways. I think they did coerce him in one way which was effective, and that was by threatening him with disapproval, or at least refusing him the applause which they gave him in overflowing measure when he first appeared. But I want to say this: That when the world heard the words he uttered when launching this country into war I wrote Mr. Tumulty, and I felt it deeply in my soul, that that address would pass into history as the most momentous utterance that ever fell from human lips since Pope Urban II preached the first crusade at Cleremont-Peronne, over 800 years ago.

LEAGUE COVENANT MEANS FORCE AND WAR.

"When he said this would be a war to make the world safe for democracy, and men gave their blood for it, the earth which swallowed that libation of hero sacrifice would forever after refuse to tolerate the conditions those heroes died to overthrow, in Ireland and everywhere else in the world. [Applause.] Now, I assert that it would be as impossible for the President to come back and set up such a machinery of force to dominate the world, in view of what he said, as is embodied in this treaty, as it would have been for Godfrey of Bouillon or any of the later crusaders to come back and try to establish Mohammedanism in his own dominions after he had shed the blood of his fellows to overthrow the dominion of the Crescent in the East. And I think it would be equally impossible to establish in this country this dominion of force that the league contemplates. How it will be abolished I do not know, any more than anybody could have foreseen the glorious outcome of the reconstruction of this country after the close of the Civil War. I am sure the chairman of this committee will remember that men of the highest standing, men like Charles Sumner and Thaddeus M. Stevens and Oliver P. Morton, patriots of the highest type, believed it would be necessary to take the most drastic precautions against a renewal of secession in the South. On the other hand, the leaders of the Democratic Party of the South believed that they were entitled at once to unconditional restoration of their governments and to establish a new system as they pleased.

"A golden mean was struck between the two. Their government was given back to them when it was clear that there would be no attempt to fasten the payment of the Confederate debt upon any part of this country. When that was made clear, then their control of their governments was absolute. And then that country—which had been ravaged as no other land had been ravaged before, whose industrial system had been subverted, whose cities had been burned, whose fields had been desecrated, where the last dollar of capital had been expended—rose from the ashes almost in a night and marched forward to the enjoyment of a prosperity greater in measure than that which has blessed any other part of this country.

DISARMAMENT WILL ALONE BRING UNIVERSAL PEACE.

"So I believe that we will get out of this the thing which the world needs, and that is disarmament. When you get disarmament you will have peace, for the very simple reason that there will not be any means with which nations can fight. Let us disarm. We have the power, and we need not lift a finger to do it. As Senator KNOX pointed out yesterday, the whole world is bankrupt. They are all intent on great armaments, but they can not establish them unless we give them the means to do it. They can not reorganize their industry. Their hope is that we will give them money for industrial reorganization, and then they will use their own resources for the establishment of great armaments on land and sea.

"For the first time in the history of the world a great war has ended leaving one power that can do the greatest harm by land and sea if it wants to, but it does not want to do it. It has the means to resuscitate society, and it does not want to exercise its power for any other purpose than the benefit of the whole human family. What is it that we are asked to do? As Senator KNOX well said yesterday, we are asked to use our resources for the regeneration of the world, not according to our idea of what would be effective, but to submit our judgment to that of other nations whose policies have led them to the path out of which they now cry to us for deliverance. Now, if there be any place in the world where anything better than America can be found to whom the disposition of American resources could be intrusted, I am ready, for my part, to see those resources turned over. But where is it? Where is there in the world any force comparable to the United States as an agency to establish justice, an agency which by the blessing of God has unlimited power, and seeks to exercise it for no purpose except the welfare of those who need it most? And we are asked to subordinate our control over our own resources to the judgment of nations that I think nobody here will dispute are inferior to us in intelligence and in love of justice. We are asked to give up the greater for the less, to abase the lofty and to join the lower.

ISOLATION INSURES EMINENCE TO NATION.

"It is said that we want isolation. Well, Mr. Chairman, that isolation was given to us by Almighty God when He gave us the first place in civilization. Eminence is always isolated, and the eminence we enjoy is our necessary isolation from the rest of the world. It is not an eminence and an isolation that we want selfishly to retain. No; no; no! America invites all the world to come up and end that isolation by sharing the eminence in which she has rested since the reorganization of this Republic. [Applause.] From the spirit that has been displayed in this gathering here to-day I have abundant confidence that she will not abandon that eminence to come down from it by abasing herself to the prejudices, the hostilities, the struggles of the European powers that have plunged the world into the welter of blood from which we have delivered them and from whose consequences we now hope to hold them.

"Senator KNOX has stated much better than I could state it the policy that is before us. With disarmament secured, the world can not fight; and then, with an unarmed world, there will be a league of nations; there will be some kind of a body to adjust disputes, for the nations can not fight without three years of preparation. And there will be disputes. There will be disputes as long as there are human beings.

IRELAND WILL CONTRIBUTE TO CIVILIZATION.

"Now, there are but two things that men and nations can do when they engage in disputes. They can either fight or they can talk. If they have not the means to fight, then there is nothing left for them to do but talk. And when we put them in the position where all they can do is talk, then they will establish tribunals to make that talk effective, and that, Mr. Chairman, I believe, will be the outcome of this situation. It may not come immediately. There may be some delay, but it is inevitable, because anything else spells not merely danger to this country but the ruin of civilization itself. I do not believe that civilization is to be ruined, and I believe that in one respect Ireland can make a contribution to the civilization of the world and to the cause of freedom which is of immeasurable value. We all know that the great trouble to-day which confronts the world is the great difficulty of keeping up voluntary cooperation in production. On every side we find men refusing to work for various reasons. There seems to be no possible way in which this difficulty can be adjusted. I have talked with those who are called captains of industry, and they tell me that the raising of wages is no panacea, because it is the men who are most highly paid who are generally the quickest to strike; and, of course, we can not scourge men to work, because the days of servitude in labor are over.

"Now, if it be impossible to make men work through fear or through hope of profit in wages, what hope is left, when it needs the active work of everybody at once to replace the dreadful waste of this war? There is one way in which it can be done, and one way only.

INDUSTRIAL CAPACITY AS GREAT AS EVER.

"It is possible that we could restore industry and make it effective if men could be induced to work for love of the soil of their country in the same way that soldiers fight to defend it. Now, President de Valera, as you may have seen, has proposed a loan of $5,000,000. Most people think that is to maintain the political agitation for Irish independence. It is not. Mr. de Valera explained to me that his main purpose is to reorganize Irish industry, and his hope is that some of the captains of industry in America will direct the expenditure of that money. Then all the industries can be started in Ireland with the best hope of making them profitable and successful; and when that is done, he says he can guarantee that when he urges the Irish people to go out and work to make the soil fruitful, as they were eager to fight to make their soil independent, there will be no hesitation in the response, and that men will not stop to think of hours or pay, any more than soldiers stop to consider them in battle, but that they will go out and work as one man to prove that the industrial capacity of Ireland is to-day as great as it ever was, and even greater.

"In Ireland there is practically no crime. Crimes against property are absolutely unknown. There has scarcely ever a burglary or forgery been committed. All the offenses there grow out of the wretched system of land tenure. Outside of that the jails are empty and criminal causes are almost unknown. The obedience which the Irish have always yielded to the leaders of their choice has been absolute, extraordinary, and unanimous.

THE PEACE OF THE WORLD DEPENDS UPON IRELAND'S INDEPENDENCE.

"In the midst of the famine Daniel O'Connell could raise hundreds of thousands of pounds to maintain agitation for the repeal of the union. During the dreadful period of 1873–74 and 1878, when there was another failure of the potato crop in Ireland, they raised 40,000 pounds for the furtherance of the causes championed by Parnell. Leaders of their own choice they have always followed implicitly. Mr. de Valera says that, although he is a president who has not a foot of ground upon which he can place an official chair, no officer whose movements he can direct, and no treasury from which he can draw a dollar, yet by a simple word he can start into active cooperation every man, woman, and child, every pair of human hands upon that island. And if it comes to pass that there is developed among civilized beings a system of industry that rests, not upon the desire for wages or the fear of punishment or the fear of famine but upon the love of one's soil, have we not taken a tremendous step toward the solution of the great difficulty which now confronts civilization?

"Mr. Chairman, I put this before you as my one final suggestion. We must have the independence of Ireland if peace is to be established throughout the world. Peace can not be established by England. Eight centuries of history have proved that. Her latest attempt even at justice, sir, is the concluding proof of her inability. The Irish people will never submit to a war enforced upon them, even by a thousand leagues of nations. The league of nations itself is an abomination, an attempt to use the conscience of Christendom to confer jurisdiction to enforce wrongs which morality and justice condemn; and, although judgment and good sense may have departed from quarters where we had a right to expect to find them, yet we feel confident that here in this body the wisdom of the fathers will be vindicated by such an exercise of wisdom, such a display of patriotism, such an exercise of vigilance as will insure to this people the rights to which they were born, the rights which some of us who have come here have acquired through the operation of our constitutional system, and by maintaining this Constitution intact kindle and keep trimmed before the eyes of all men the lamp which will guide their footsteps to freedom, to justice, and to an unending prosperity. [Applause.]"

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, last Saturday at 5.30 o'clock the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had offered an amendment to the bill. He withdrew the amendment with a view of making some changes in it before again presenting it to the Senate. I do not know whether the Senator has perfected that amendment or not, but I do know that he has a dozen other amendments that have been printed and are lying upon the desks of the Senators, I suppose, at this time. I can not say whether the Senator from Wisconsin is through with his general remarks or not, but as far as the committee are concerned they have offered all of the amendments to the bill that they expect to present.

I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will be in the Chamber in a moment and offer whatever amendments he wishes to the bill at this time or proceed with whatever remarks he desires to make. I am just informed by one of the pages that the Senator from Wisconsin has been notified that the bill is now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to have any action taken by the Senate before the Senator from Wisconsin arrives. I think it would save time if the Senate would just wait a moment until he arrives.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate, which really has been before the Senate, as we are in recess, during the present legislative day, has now reached for the first time on this 2d day of September a consideration. It is now 10 minutes after 3 o'clock. I mention that fact simply because all the time that has been occupied during this calendar day by discussion upon various subjects of great importance has not touched the bill before the Senate until this moment. I am prompted to note that fact in the RECORD because I think since the bill became the unfinished business I have been charged with having delayed by debate the consideration of the bill during the time it has been before the Senate. I remember that on one of the days when the bill was pending before the Senate it was not discussed at all; it was not mentioned; I did not have the floor. The debate ran during the entire day on the league of nations. I am not very sensitive upon that subject, but I just mention it for the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed his speech begun last Wednesday. After having spoken for some time,

GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for the purpose of permitting me to make a request for unanimous consent to take up for consideration H. R. 7594, relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not yield without the consent of the Senator from Utah, who has charge of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from New York, and also to the Senator from Wisconsin, that I have no objection at all to the Senator yielding providing that the bill is not going to lead to any discussion, and that if it does lead to any discussion the Senator will withdraw it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it is an important measure, perhaps we ought not to have it considered with this small attendance here.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I do not think there will be any objection to the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know what the measure is.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just a bill conferring upon Gen. Pershing the rank of general.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, my request is actuated by this thought: The President, so we are informed, is to leave Washington to-morrow and to be gone approximately a month. I have thought, and members of the Committee on Military Affairs have thought, in view of the fact that this bill was reported from the committee unanimously, and that thus far we have not heard of opposition to it from the Senators, that it would be a graceful and proper thing for us to do to secure the passage of the bill to-day so that it might be returned to the House for signature and sent to the President for his signature before he departs upon his journey. That is why I make this request for immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that if the Senator from Wisconsin has no objection——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I have not.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly have not, with the distinct understanding that if it leads to any lengthy discussion the Senator from New York will withdraw the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall, of course, abide by that understanding.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE resumed his speech, which will be published entire after it shall have been concluded. After having spoken for some time, Mr. LA FOLLETTE said:

Now, Mr. President, I wish to take up particularly the sections of the bill which deal with what are known as the relief provisions. I am not sure but that it would work a saving of time if I took up for the remainder of this session certain other amendments which I wish to present. I desire to have a quorum present when certain of these amendments are voted on, but perhaps I have one here that we can dispose of without raising any question of a quorum. I do not want to raise that question and occasion any delay if it can be avoided. So out of the order in which I intended to present them I will offer the amendment which I send now to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 26, line 21, at the end of section 26, the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That if any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form a part of or are in any wise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, or sodium entered into by the lessee, or of which the output thereof should become the subject of any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, tacit, or otherwise, to control the price or prices thereof, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of the amounts of lands provided in this act, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the provisions of the amendment are exactly the words found in the Alaskan coal-leasing act down to the word "lessee" in line 10. There I am going to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that he strike out, after the word "or" in line 10, all the balance of that line and lines 11 and 12 and the first two words in line 13, including the word "thereof," and in place of those words insert the following:

Any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise, to which such lessee shall be a party, of which his or its output is to be or become the subject to control the price or prices thereof.

Then the balance of the amendment will remain just the same. In other words, I am fearful that if the wording remains as it is, where the Senator refers in his amendment to "the output thereof," we can not tell from the reading whether it refers to the combination or whether it refers to the oil, shale, gas, or sodium. It is only clarifying, I am quite sure, just what the Senator wants to insert and just exactly what I think ought to be in the bill. The amendment ought to be agreed to, and with that amendment to it and one other which I desire to call to the Senator's attention I think it will be all right.

Under the existing law—what is known as the Webb law—provision is made in the matter of exportation for combinations and understandings, and I want at the close of this amendment to add the following:

But nothing herein contained shall be held to modify in any respect or to repeal, in whole or in part, the act of Congress approved April 10, 1918.

I will say to the Senate that that is the Webb Act. Then I think the amendment would cover just what the Senator has in mind. I do not know really how he feels about the Webb Act, but I will say to the Senator it does change it to that extent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am aware of that. I have not the language before me which the Senator proposes, but, from listening to it as he reads it, I would accept it tentatively.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be accepted, and then the Senator can have a chance to see it in the RECORD.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. With reference to the other amendment, however, I would rather not accept it.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the language of the Webb Act?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I was not in favor of that legislation.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee with reference to the amendment relating to the Webb Act. So far as these contracts are concerned, should there be any exception? In other words, should there be any encouragement whatever for combination under the Webb Act for exports?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On coal, oil, or phosphate? I think that is worthy of a little reflection, and I would suggest to the Senator from Utah that he permit the amendment to be adopted at this time, with the modification he first suggested, and that he offer his other amendment and let it be printed in the RECORD, and we can take it up in the morning.

Mr. SMOOT. The only thing I thought of was, for instance, we export a great deal of phosphate; but the suggestion the Senator makes, I think, is a wise one. Then we will have the amendment agreed to as amended, with the exception of that part which refers to the Webb Act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I should like to look at the proposed amendment in the morning when the RECORD comes out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin ask to have reported the amendment as he proposes it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; as amended. I should like to have the amendment as amended by the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Utah offers the following modification, beginning in line 10 of the proposed amendment, after the word "or," strike out down to and including the word "thereof," in line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise, to which such lessee shall be a party, of which his or its output is to be or become subject to control the price or prices thereof.

So that as amended it will read:

At the end of section 26, page 26, line 21, insert the following:

"And provided further, That if any of the lands or deposits leased under the provisions of this act shall be subleased, trusteed, possessed, or controlled by any device permanently, temporarily, directly, indirectly, tacitly, or in any manner whatsoever, so that they form a part of or are in anywise controlled by any combination in the form of an unlawful trust, with consent of lessee, or form the subject of any contract or conspiracy in restraint of trade in the mining or selling of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, or sodium entered into by the lessee or any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise, to which such lessee shall be a party of which his or its output is to be or become subject to control the price or prices thereof, or of any holding of such lands by any individual, partnership, association, corporation, or control, in excess of the amounts of lands provided in this act, the lease thereof shall be forfeited by appropriate court proceedings."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as I am able to follow the reading of the suggested change in my amendment I think it means the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there is any doubt of it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept it for the time being and offer the amendment as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator allow the Secretary to report again a portion of the language which seems to the Chair ambiguous?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should be very glad to have it reported.

The Secretary read as follows:

In the proposed modification of the Senator from Utah occur these words:

"Of which his or its output is to be or become subject to control the price or prices thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. "Subject to control." What does that mean?

Mr. SMOOT. It is exactly the language of the law to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does not the Senator from Utah mean "the subject of any agreement or understanding"?

Mr. SMOOT. I read it right first.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. "The subject of any agreement or understanding."

Mr. SMOOT. It reads "is to be or become subject to control."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would it not be better to say "the subject of any agreement or understanding"?

Mr. SMOOT. No; control under the understanding.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think it is very happily phrased.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it had better be printed in the RECORD and then we can see its relation to the whole amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the word "or" in line 10 of the amendment proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "thereof" in line 13, and in lieu thereof to insert:

Any agreement or understanding, written, verbal, or otherwise, to which such lessee shall be a party, of which his or its output is to be or become the subject to control the price or prices thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, Mr. President, I will offer the amendment I send to the desk. I am offering these amendments, Mr. President, somewhat out of the order in which I had intended to present them at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. He prefers at this time that this amendment should be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, at the end of section 12, after the word "deposits" in line 12, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That each lease of phosphate under this act shall stipulate that all phosphates and phosphate products produced or secured under such lease shall be distributed and used only within the limits of the United States or its possessions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish at this time to move that when the Senate takes a recess to-day it be until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment which is now presented by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was considered by the Public Lands Committee not only as to phosphate but as to oil and all other products covered by the bill; but of all of them, it seems to me, the amendment is least applicable to phosphates, and for this reason: The United States to-day is a heavy exporter of phosphate. The percentage of the world's export trade in phosphates is as follows: Tunis, 53 per cent, or 2,178,014 tons. The United States comes second as the largest exporter, exporting 34.7 per cent of all the phosphates of the world, amounting to 1,424,750 tons. Algeria is next, with 9.2 per cent; Egypt, with 1.7 per cent; France, with six-tenths of 1 per cent; Belgium, with five-tenths of 1 per cent; Germany, with two-tenths of 1 per cent; Italy, with one-tenth of 1 per cent; or a total export trade in phosphates for all the countries in the world of 4,107,853 tons.

The countries importing phosphates covering that 4,107,853 tons are as follows: France, 909,212 tons, or a percentage of the world's trade of 22.1 per cent; Germany, 742,267 tons, or 18.1 per cent; Italy, 614,969 tons, or 15 per cent; the United Kingdom, 455,307 tons, or 11.1 per cent; Belgium, 274,311 tons, or 6.7 per cent; Spain, 254,074 tons, or 6.2 per cent; Austria-Hungary, 100,068 tons, or 2.3 per cent; Japan, 88,674 tons, or 2.2 per cent; British possessions in the Far East, 64,904 tons, or 1.6 per cent; Sweden, 61,909 tons, or 1.6 per cent; Portugal, 45,244 tons, or 1.1 per cent; Denmark, 38,293 tons, or nine-tenths of 1 per cent; Russia, 16,671 tons, or four-tenths of 1 per cent; Switzerland, 6,568 tons, or one-tenth of 1 per cent; Canada, 5,478 tons, or one-tenth of 1 per cent; Australia and other countries, 106,395 tons, or 2.6 per cent.

In other words, there are no importations whatever of phosphates into the United States. I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin offering the amendment that there are almost untold quantities of phosphate in Wyoming, Utah, Montana, and in a part of Colorado. Up to the present time those phosphate deposits have not been worked to any extent nor can they be on account of the lack of railroad transportation; but we certainly do not want to say that those mammoth veins and great mountains of phosphate in our western country shall be forever denied exportation. I believe the time will come, and I do not believe it is many years off, when the great deposits in that section will be worked; and I expect to see the product of those great bodies of phosphate exported to all European countries.

If there were not enough phosphate in this country to take care of the needs of the United States I would gladly join the Senator in doing anything to prohibit a pound of it from being exported from this country; but I can not see how it is possible for the United States to use more than a small portion of the known deposits of phosphate which are located in the West. I can take the Senator into portions of Montana, Idaho, and also Utah and show him miles and miles of phosphate there not only in blanket form but in ledge form. We who are acquainted with that section of the country know the great amount of this material that lies there. It does not have to be discovered; we know it is there; and knowing that we do not want forever to tie it up and prevent it being exported if the time comes when we can get transportation so that its exportation will be justified.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I should like to inquire in what form the phosphate is found to which the Senator has called attention and which he says abounds so largely in certain sections of the West? How is it deposited, and how expensive is it to mine?

Mr. SMOOT. It is in the form of phosphate rock and is not expensive to mine; in fact, in one part of my State there is a bed which I visited which can be mined by the same method as employed by the great Utah Copper Co., which extracts its ore by steam shovels. Railroads to transport the ore, if necessary, could be built; but I do not think that will be necessary, because a plant could be put up alongside of the phosphate beds and the phosphate shoveled into the mill and ground up as fine as sand. Some of it is now being shipped to California.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the value per ton of that phosphate upon the ground where it is produced?

Mr. SMOOT. The cost of preparing it of late has advanced so rapidly and the wages required to be paid have gone up to such an extent that I can not say what the price is to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. About what?

Mr. FALL. Four dollars and fifty-seven cents a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a little more than that, is it not?

Mr. FALL. Before the war it was $3.12, and for Tennessee phosphate the price was from $3.50 to $4.57, depending upon the character of the rock.

Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think possibly I can throw a little light upon this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I will gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. Is it mined as rock?

Mr. SMOOT. It is rock and nothing more.

Mr. FALL. It is rock, pure and simple. It is brown limestone or blue limestone, and is a mass of shells. In Tennessee, in South Carolina, and in Florida it is through all the Permian formation, which extends all through the Rocky Mountain region. Lying above the Cretaceous formation and above the Carboniferous formation, we have a great series of what are known as red beds throughout the Rocky Mountain region. What percentage may be in New Mexico remains to be discovered, but phosphate rock exists there in such quantities that it is possible to trace a ledge of it for 150 miles on the east side of the Tularosa Valley and on the west side for 100 miles. It is from 4 to 20 feet thick. Whether the percentage would be sufficient to enable anyone to ship it would be another question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What does that product sell for in the markets of the East?

Mr. FALL. It sells for nothing at all with us; we can not mine it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How far is it shipped?

Mr. FALL. The great deposits of it to-day that are being mined in the United States are in the States of Tennessee, South Carolina, and Florida. In Florida it occurs in two or three different formations, but they have practicaly worked out what they call the white deposit, which was a soft redeposit bleached out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is exhausted?

Mr. FALL. That is exhausted, never having existed in very large quantities; but in Tennessee the richer phosphate is in what they call the brown phosphate rock, composed of certain character of shells; the rock itself is a mass of sea shells. The blue phosphate is inexhaustible in quantity. It is harder and more costly to work than the brown phosphate, which is a more friable rock, and, as the Senator from Utah has said, is worked by steam shovels.

When it comes to working the blue phosphate, I can say to the Senator that it is almost as inexhaustible as the mountains wherever the limestone formation occurs in the Rocky Mountains. It is simply a question now of freight. It is in the position, I may say to the Senator, as gypsum in New Mexico. We have a deposit of gypsum belonging to the Government of the United States 30 miles long, from 3 to 7 miles in width, which has been blown up in ridges and is as white as the driven snow. It is worth possibly $15 per ton. It is sulphate of lime; but we can not work it. If we could get it to Niagara, where we could get cheap electric power, we might carbonize it and extract the sulphur from it, in the first place, and make sulphuric acid, and possibly change the sulphate of soda which occurs along with it to carbonated soda, which would be worth $34 a ton or more at this time.

There it is lying. Any man in the world can go and take it. They are using it here on the wheat fields of Virginia and all over the South to attempt to restore the fertility of these old fields. If you can get that deposit, you can get millions and millions and millions of tons of it, but you can not haul it. It will not pay the transportation.

The phosphate rock that we have in that country is not developed at all. There has been no incentive for us to prospect for phosphate in this immediate country, because before the war it was only worth approximately $4.57 a ton—which means ground and washed—for rock containing 52 to 57 per cent of phosphate, and it would not pay us. Only recently, therefore, has there been any attempt by prospectors to locate or prospect for phosphate; and I can say to the Senator that within six weeks before I came on here I personally rode over 150 miles of phosphate rock in New Mexico adjoining my own ranch property, in the immediate vicinity, in machine and on horseback, and found evidences of it everywhere.

The Senator understands that phosphate very easily leaches, so that when it is exposed to the air it is constantly losing its value and washing off. As the snow falls, and frosts come, and winds blow, and rains fall, it washes off in the soil, and is lost completely; and until you get under the ground a certain distance the phosphate is of no appreciable value.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Wherever it is exposed——

Mr. FALL. Wherever it is exposed, it leaches out. It is very easy to see it. You can recognize phosphate rock as soon as you lay your eyes on it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How rapidly does it lose its value when it is exposed? Is it a matter of days or weeks or longer?

Mr. FALL. A matter of weeks, possibly a matter of years. Of course, the erosion of those mountains is going on continuously, and as the erosion goes on we are losing the value of the phosphate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not know that the elements would destroy its value in so short a time.

Mr. FALL. Very rapidly. It is very much like the nitrates, which deteriorate rapidly on exposure to the air when taken from the caves.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Can it be shipped long distances without wasting its properties?

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes. It can be shipped, and is usually mixed with other material for fertilizer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very much interested in and have been enlightened by the observations of the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. It occurs, I can say to the Senator, whether in paying quantities or not, at least in appreciable quantities, throughout the entire upper formation lying about the Cretaceous formation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, we have in this country great areas of agricultural lands the fertility of which is practically exhausted.

Mr. FALL. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And my motive in offering the amendment was to conserve these products for our own use here first, before we permitted exportation.

Mr. FALL. I myself, prospecting with pick and shovel, broke it off for, I think, a distance of 150 miles, where it is shown on a great escarpment. The mountains on the one side are tilted to the west, and the mountains on the other side are tilted to the east, and the valley has subsided between them, and you have a cross section of the entire formation, because it is from 2,000 to 7,000 feet in height; and you can see the entire formation in layers as it exists, the different limes and sandstones, and so forth, resting on the granite. You can trace it from the old archaic granite up from 2,000 to 7,000 feet, and see everything there is there. It is a perfect cross section of the entire country; and in the lower part of this formation, in the great, heavy blue beds of limestone, which you would not notice unless your attention was called to it, upon examination you will discover that by breaking it with a hammer you can smell it immediately. You will discover that it is a perfect mass of shells which have all been sea life at one time, and it has lain there just as it was formed by the sea, and there it exists to-day. Now, of course, it must carry fifty-odd per cent of phosphate before it is worth even $4, or worth anything at all, in the market; and, as I say, 50 to 55 per cent phosphate before the war was worth in Tennessee from $3.57 to $4.57, washed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about this matter, with the permission of the Senator who has the floor.

There are withdrawn from entry, classified as phosphate lands, 2,724,394 acres; and, as has been suggested, the character of these lands is not speculative, as is the case with much of the land withdrawn as oil land. That is withdrawn because it is believed, or a guess is made, that it contains oil; but in the case of these phosphate lands the rock outcrops, so that geologists have no difficulty whatever in asserting positively that the phosphate rock is there. As indicated, it is a sedimentary rock, just exactly the same as limestone is.

Mr. FALL. It is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Usually, in fact, lime is a large constituent of it.

Mr. FALL. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very often the rock is so uptilted that the deposit is perpendicular rather than lateral, so that it bears the appearance oftentimes of being a ledge or a deposit of rock that comes up in a crevice in the earth's surface; but that is not its origin. It is not igneous in any sense. That is not its origin.

This will give the Senate some idea of the extent of those deposits; but, Mr. President, if there were no other way of reaching this matter except by this discriminatory provision, discriminating against the new and untried and undeveloped fields as against those that have been operated for years in the past, there would be very much merit in the suggestion that they ought to be preserved for our own use, however extensive they are. Of course, exactly the same thing might be said with reference to our copper. There is no more reason that I can see why we should prohibit the exportation of phosphate than there is why we should prohibit the exportation of copper or, for the matter of that, of silver or, for the matter of that, of lead. The principle is as well applicable to the one as to the other; but there is no occasion, Mr. President, to do so. If our supply of phosphates seems inadequate to the necessities of our own people, we can reach those that are now held in private ownership just exactly as well as we can reach those that are now held in public ownership, because there is no trouble about Congress at any time passing an act preventing the exportation from this country of any phosphates, whether they come from private sources and private lands or from lands leased under the provisions of this bill.

So I think it quite unfair and unjust that we should turn over the entire export trade in phosphates to the States of Florida, South Carolina, and Tennessee, as against these undeveloped deposits of the West. They labor under the disadvantage of being at remote places from the seaboard, where they must go for export, and at remote distances from the centers in which commercial fertilizer is used to any very considerable extent. It is a serious question as to whether the mining of this rock can be carried on economically or not. As I indicated the other day, the utilization of this resource contemplates the carrying on of an extensive educational work throughout the Middle West, where it is believed that a profitable market can be found for this product; but the Senator from Wisconsin knows that the farmers of his State will have to be taught the use of phosphate rock as a profitable fertilizer. We shall have to demonstrate it to them against the conservatism that the Senator knows ordinarily appears. Why, the Senator from North Dakota, I recall, when this matter was talked of here upon the floor some time ago, asserted that the wheat fields of his State needed no such meretricious aid in order to make them productive.

There is, however, another consideration which ought to be borne in mind in this connection. We ought to give these resources the advantage at the outset, at least, of any possible market that they can find. I apprehend that probably this amendment would not seriously affect the situation at present, because these fields are so remote that I imagine very likely they will not be able to compete in export trade, for instance, with South Carolina and Florida. Florida, prior to the war, annually exported some $9,000,000 worth of phosphate. It, of course, would be difficult for the western fields to compete with them, they being right on the seaboard; but I think we ought not to place any obstacles in the way of the product finding any markets it can, and the speedy development of it ought to be encouraged for this reason.

The rock in its original state is insoluble, and scarcely available. It is used by being ground into fine powder and scattered upon the land to be fertilized. Then, by the slow process of oxidation, the phosphoric acid, which is the active principle of the rock, is released, and finds its way into the adjacent soil; but it ordinarily contains phosphoric acid in only a very small proportion, and the untreated rock—that is, the rock merely ground up and pulverized—is so bulky and so heavy an article that the transportation rates practically forbid its use. It becomes necessary, therefore, to reduce it to a concentrated form and to a soluble form, and that is done by the application of sulphuric acid.

Our great copper smelters in the West, in the State of Utah and in the State of Montana and in the State of Wyoming, are belching out into the atmosphere annually thousands of tons of sulphuric acid for which no market whatever can be found, and that to the destruction, or at least to the injury, of vegetation and no doubt of animal life adjacent to these smelters. It is hoped that we shall be able to conserve this valuable product and use it in the treatment of these phosphate ores, reducing them to a soluble form and to a concentrated form in which they will stand shipment to the centers where they can be used; and accordingly I submit that we ought to give them every opportunity to develop, and thus to seek any market that is open. But in any case we are not driven to this method of conserving our supply of phosphate ores, because by the simple process of putting an embargo upon the exportation of phosphate we can reach the lands held in private ownership as well as those with which we are now dealing.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am very much gratified, indeed, to be informed of the abundant supply of these phosphate deposits in the West. I knew about it somewhat in the East, and I knew that in some of the southern fields the supply was exhausted, and I felt that we ought to conserve its uses to our own country, but I am inclined, on the information furnished here by the Senators from Utah and New Mexico and Montana, to withdraw the amendment which I offered, in the belief that for a long period of time, at least, there will be no occasion to husband our resources of phosphate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin is withdrawn.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have a number of other amendments, Mr. President, which I shall want to offer when the opportunity affords.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator having charge of this bill moves a recess, I think it is fair to the Senator to say at this time that if this bill is not disposed of tomorrow I shall make an effort to invoke the provisions of the amendment to Rule XXXII. The bill has now been before the Senate for something like 12 days, and the business of the Senate is such that it seems to me it justifies the suggestion which I make. I make it now because after tomorrow there will still be two days given to the full consideration of every phase of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have occupied some time upon this bill, and have some further observations to make upon it and some comments to offer. I shall be able, I think, to keep easily within the time limit, if the Senate should see fit to adopt the cloture provisions of our rule, in covering what I have definitely in mind to say to the Senate and the amendments that I have to offer; but I feel constrained to observe that I do not think the proceedings upon this bill have been such as to cause any Senator to resort to cloture to pass the bill. I am not conscious myself of having consumed on this bill one moment of time more than I have felt that I ought to as a matter of duty to the legislation, aside from the fact that I have been diverted by the trend of debate to take some time to discuss the abstract principle of the filibuster and to make some observations pertaining to the cost of living.

Mr. President, I really feel that Senators who themselves upon subjects that have not been before the Senate at all, that have not been even reported from committee, have taken time in making speeches here more than I have taken during the entire session. I have occupied the floor on just two subjects since this session began on the 19th of May. One was to aid in preserving the existence of the Tariff Commission, which it was proposed in one of the appropriation bills to legislate out of existence. I did take a couple of hours in discussing that matter. The other subject upon which I have spoken is the bill that is now before the Senate.

We have had several speeches this session by Senators upon the league of nations and the treaty, which has not yet been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Foreign Relations. A number of these Senators have each made three and four and five speeches. I have been instructed and entertained by some of these speeches, and should not think of criticizing any Senators for speaking any number of times upon the subject. That is their right. It is the right of every Senator to address the Senate upon these measures, and I resent the suggestion made that I am taking an undue amount of time in discussing this bill. I am deeply interested in it, and am moved by no other purpose than to aid in making it a better bill. I do not often intrude myself into the debates of the Senate, and when I do upon some subject concerning which I am especially interested I feel at liberty to take such time as seems proper and to be guided as to that matter by my own judgment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am very sorry if the Senator feels resentful because of the notice which I gave. I gave it because I wanted to avoid as far as possible the appearance of being otherwise than fair. Under the provisions of the rule, if the application were presented to-morrow, the Chair will lay it before the Senate at the expiration of the first hour of the second day after it is so presented. It occurred to me that as the Senator has had the floor, not constantly, of course, but in the absence of other subjects, for something like four or five days, two other sessions should be amply sufficient for his purposes. I know that it could have been filed to-day and without any notice whatever. My purpose in giving the notice was among other things to make provision for two days, which, if we meet at 11 and adjourn at 6, will give ample opportunity, at least I thought it would give ample opportunity, to the Senator to complete his discussion of the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Perhaps the Senator will consent to an agreement to fix a time to vote.

Mr. THOMAS. That offer was made some time ago and the Senator from Wisconsin objected.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that I am going to ask the Senate to-morrow night, if the bill is not passed, to continue in session. I had expected to do so to-night, but there were so many Senators who had engagements that had been previously made that I doubted very much whether it would be proper to undertake to hold a session to-night. However, I am going to do so to-morrow, and I hope Senators will not be inconvenienced by it and will take this as notice that we are going to hold a night session unless the bill is disposed of before the hour arrives.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I shall be very glad indeed to join with the Senator in a session to-morrow night, to be continued as late as the Senator may desire. I shall be entirely willing to see this bill forced through under cloture, if its friends think that a wise proceeding with legislation of this character. So the Senator from Utah can be assured that he will have no opposition from me if we remain in session until we get through with the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I had expected no opposition from the Senator, only I thought it was proper to state at this time what the intention is, so that Senators will know exactly what will happen.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin, before he leaves the Chamber, whether he will not consent to a time to be fixed to vote upon the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will not, Mr. President, because I do not know how the debate may run upon the amendments, and if a time is fixed to vote, possibly I should not be able to offer some of the amendments I want to have voted upon. I think we can run along with this legislation just as we do with legislation usually and get through with amendments and with debate upon them in an orderly way.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ILLEGAL ENTRY OF ALIENS.

Mr. PHELAN. Out of order I should like to introduce a resolution. I have been waiting a long time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 176) was read as follows:

Whereas it is reported that during the last year and for a considerable period prior thereto illegal and surreptitious entries of aliens across the boundaries of the United States have taken place; and

Whereas owing to our extensive coast lines and land boundaries and the retirement of the patrol and other official services maintained under the passport control regulations up to the 30th day of June, 1919, there has been less protection against such illegal entries than existed prior to such date; and

Whereas such coast lines and land boundaries should be efficiently guarded and patrolled, and additional officers detailed to the various immigration stations so as to prevent the illegal and surreptitious entry of aliens across such borders and coast lines: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration be requested and is hereby instructed to secure such information as may be available on the matters set forth in the foregoing preamble and report the same, together with its recommendations thereon, to the Senate.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it had better go over.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow. I will say that I have no intention myself of opposing it.

Mr. PHELAN. It is merely asking a committee to investigate and report.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it will be immediately referred to the committee. I misunderstood the Senator's request.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess, it being, under the order heretofore entered, until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 3, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 2, 1919.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify the absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-five Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chaplain will offer prayer.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite and eternal Spirit, for the intellectual, moral, and spiritual progress of the past, yet we realize that there are vast areas which have not yet been explored, great heights which have not yet been climbed, problems which have not yet been solved.

Help us to keep in mind the promises, "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you," that as individuals and as a people we may go forward to yet greater attainments under the spiritual leadership of Jesus of Nazareth, the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

COMMITTEE TO MAKE ARRANGEMENTS FOR WELCOME OF GEN. PERSHING.

The SPEAKER. As the joint committee on the part of the House to make arrangements for appropriate exercises to welcome Gen. Pershing, the Chair appoints the following Members: Mr. MONDELL, Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, Mr. LAGUARDIA, Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. DENT, and Mr. FIELDS.

BATTLE OF THE MARNE.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, five years ago this coming Friday there was fought in France one of the greatest battles in all history. On the morning of that day, fraught with the destiny of civilization, the French army after days of retreat before the invading Germans made their stand on the south side of the river Marne, taking the offensive, the immediate result of which was to drive the Germans back to the Aisne and the Somme, and the ultimate result of which, with the support of the valiant Americans and the gallant British, was a complete annihilation of the German war machine. That day of victory is being celebrated in France, and justly so, for had the heroic French been defeated the war would have terminated with results as disastrous as the debacle of 1871. We have among our Members a gentleman who has made a study of the battle of the Marne. As I know his remarks will be of great interest to all who will hear him, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes this coming Friday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk, on the subject of the first battle of the Marne.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] may address the House for 30 minutes on Friday next upon the subject mentioned. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered yesterday by my colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, before the eleventh convention of the National Federation of Postal Employees, in this city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address delivered by his colleague yesterday. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing therein four letters, with the specimen questionnaires upon the subject of the inadequacy of pay of the Postal Service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD upon the inadequacy of the pay of the Postal Service. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we all receive a great many of these letters. How long are the ones that the gentleman wants to insert in the RECORD?

Mr. KING. They are very short.

Mr. BLACK. Who is sending out these questionnaires?

Mr. KING. These questionnaires are sent out by the employees.

Mr. BLACK. How long are they?

Mr. KING. They would not occupy more than five or six lines in the printed RECORD.

Mr. BLACK. I should not object, but on account of so many of these communications being sent to us I shall object to any further requests of this kind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SOLDIERS' SETTLEMENT BILL.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD three short letters which I hold in my hand, which I ask the Clerk to read in my time at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to have read three letters. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. BOIES. On the subject of the so-called Mondell bill, and also upon the shortage of sugar in Iowa. Those are the subjects of two of them, and I do not just remember what the third is now.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I object to the third.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the reading of the first two?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOIES. Mr. Speaker, I now recall the subject of the third. It is the question of determining the weight and quality of flour.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL, WORLD WAR VETERANS,
AURORA, ILL.

[An open letter to the honorable United States Senators and Representatives, composing the Sixty-sixth Congress.]

From observation and investigations made by a committee sent from the National Council, World War Veterans, to attend the War Risk Coordination Conference, held in Washington August 18, 1919, the executive committee of the National Council, World War Veterans, has reached the conclusion that official Washington either ignores the existence of or does not know that there exists the National Council, World War Veterans, with 2,522 organized posts and a total membership of 210,000 former soldiers, sailors, and marines, and it is therefore the pleasure of the national council to forward to each Member of the Sixty-sixth Congress a copy of the official magazine and the earnest request that the same be personally observed, and that the honorable gentlemen receiving this communication and the magazine be respectfully advised that the much heralded and widely exploited American Legion does not represent the great majority of former service men, and that the wishes of other organizations may be considered as representing the will of the veterans in such legislation affecting them and the good of the United States at large.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 21 contains an editorial from the New York Times, introduced by Hon. FRANK W. MONDELL, of Wyoming, under extension of remarks, in support of his "Mondell's soldier settlement bill," and in this editorial it would appear that the American Legion represents 4,800,000 soldiers and sailors and that these men are a unit for the Mondell bill. Congress is respectfully advised that a carefully conducted inquiry among the posts of the National Council, World War Veterans, indicates that the World War Veterans are opposed to the Mondell soldier-settlement bill and ask its defeat.

The National Council, World War Veterans, learn that there is no bill before either Senate or Congress urging the payment of $180 bonus to honorably discharged service men, and, therefore, offers Congress an opportunity to really do something for the ex-service man at this, his present time of need, and asks the passage of a bill granting $180 bonus. If Congress prefers, the National Council, World War Veterans, heartily indorses Mr. GALLIVAN'S bill, "H. R. 2923," introduced in the House May 24, 1919, and referred to Committee on Military Affairs, and asks that this bill be gotten out of committee and favorably acted upon.

Signed and transmitted to Congress by order of national executive committee, in session Chicago, Ill., August 22, 1919.

NATIONAL COUNCIL, WORLD WAR VETERANS,
By HUGH B. DONNELLY, Commander in Chief.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA, August 29, 1919.

Hon. W. D. BOIES,
Congressman Eleventh District,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BOISE: Calling your kind attention to great necessity for immediate action on existing sugar shortage in this State. Consumers complaining to retailers; they in turn are wiring, telephoning, writing for sugar, but all to no purpose, as no provision has been made by equalization board for any supply for Iowa. In our judgment immediate action stopping export of sugar should be taken, so this section of country may be able to go through canning season, which is now upon us, with sufficient supply of sugar. Nothing less than 100 cars will do Iowa any good. Our situation demands immediate attention, as already stated. Too much can not be said on the subject.

L. W. MALLERY.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., August 30, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM D. BOIES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There was introduced in the House of Representatives, July 17, 1919, by the Hon. ALBERT H. VESTAL, of Indiana, a bill "to establish a standard of weights on flour, meal, and corn products for human foods and commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes." This bill is known as H. R. 7482.

This bill changes the weights on flour packages from the old established basis of 196 pounds to the barrel to the decimal system. Why change? What's the idea?

While the Millers' National Federation has indorsed this change, the vote was by no means unanimous. Many millers are opposed to this bill and opposed to the idea of changing weights. And why are they so opposed? For the same reason that we are opposed to changing the weight of a bushel of wheat from 60 pounds to 100 pounds.

We have been getting along very nicely on the present basis for a great many years, and there is no reason for trying to revolutionize a system which has been and is entirely satisfactory to everyone, the public included.

The first thing we know some wise politician will want to change the method of keeping time and to change the days of the weeks and months. Why not? Why not change the days of the week to the decimal system? There is the same good reason as for changing the weight of flour.

There is nothing to be gained by this change. Custom has made a barrel of flour 196 pounds. The bill should be defeated, and we earnestly trust you will see the matter as we do, and that you will vote against its adoption when the time comes.

Very respectfully,

WASHBURN-CROSBY CO.,
By W. G. CROWN, Secretary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business which was in order yesterday be made in order on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the business in order yesterday be in order Thursday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TARIFF ON PEARL BUTTONS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7705, with Mr. FESS in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, on Friday last during the general debate on this bill the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] spoke for about an hour and a half, devoting most of the time to myself. In the course of his remarks he was kind enough to refer to me as "Pearl Button Green," saying that I deserved that name by reason of being an authority upon this bill. [Applause.] Well, I would rather be a pearl than a dub, and I would rather be known as being an authority upon a bill than as being distinguished for knowing nothing in relation to it. Let me say to my distinguished friend from North Carolina that if he continues the discussion of these bills in the same manner and form that he has been doing since the tariff bills were introduced, there will be no danger of his resting under the imputation of being an authority upon any of these bills or being distinguished by reason of his knowledge in relation to them. He can console himself to that extent. I can also compliment the gentleman in another particular. He can put before the House more misinformation in a given time than any other Member. His record is absolutely unequaled in that respect.

The gentleman was also kind enough to say that he thought if a letter were addressed to me as "Pearl Button Green" it would reach me in due course of time. I think very likely; but I have a little suggestion for the gentleman himself in that connection. Since he has posed of late as the official funny man of the House, there would not be any trouble in a letter reaching him addressed "Vaudeville Kitchin." I am sure it would find him without any other designation on the letter as easily as the one addressed to me which he suggested.

It is somewhat difficult to answer a gentleman who draws on his imagination for the facts and on his humor for his argument. The combination of the two is highly entertaining, but it is unnecessary to say that accuracy forms no part of it. When a gentleman talks for an hour and a half in this manner it would be impossible if I took the rest of the day to correct every misstatement that was made. I shall therefore point out only a portion of the glaring errors that were committed, and let the House judge after I am through as to how much reliance can be placed upon the other assertions that were made.

The gentleman took up the report that I had made on this bill and pointed out what he alleged to be a number of very glaring errors in it. He said that he expected when the errors were pointed out and demonstrated I would frankly acknowledge them. The gentleman was correct in his expectation. That is just what I would do if I were in error, but I was not in error. I was absolutely correct. Unfortunately I have no reason to expect from past experience on these bills that the gentleman would do the same thing if found to be wrong, no matter how glaring the mistake. On the contrary, I expect that after I am through showing the manifold errors that he committed, and the absolute accuracy of my report, he will take the floor for half an hour in reply and repeat over the same statements he made the other day.

One of the first objections he made to my report was that it stated that there were somewhere between 20,000 and 30,000 people engaged in the pearl-button industry. He said that was a wild statement, very erroneous.

I have forgotten the number, but I think it was somewhere from five to seven thousand he said was the correct number.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman will permit—no; I did not give from five to seven thousand. I gave what the tariff report gave.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman gave what the tariff report gave?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That shows how correctly the gentleman reads and how accurate he is, because the report of the Tariff Commission does not state how many persons are employed or engaged in the pearl-button industry. What the gentleman has in mind in the report of the Tariff Commission is a statement of the number engaged in the fresh-water pearl-button business. What my report refers to is the total number engaged in the pearl-button industry in the manufacture of both fresh-water and ocean pearl buttons. The statement in my report is explicit on that point. I hardly know whether I ought to take the trouble to correct the statements of a gentleman who can not read straight a tariff report which he now holds in his hands and has right under his eyes. What does the tariff report say? On page 22, near the top, if anyone will consult it, there will be found a statement that there are over 10,000 engaged in gathering the shells alone, and that nearly 20,000 are engaged in the fresh-water pearl-button industry alone.

As the tariff report did not give the number engaged in both the fresh-water pearl industry and the ocean pearl industry, I took pains to call up the Department of Commerce in order to ascertain how many there were, and was informed that there were engaged in all the factories—ocean pearl and fresh-water pearl industry—something over 14,000. Add that to the number which the tariff report gives as engaged simply in gathering the shells and getting them ready for the factory, and you have a total of nearly 25,000. If the gentleman had taken the pains he could have figured that out of the tariff report alone, because he would have discovered that the ocean pearl factories of this country made nearly one-half the quantity of buttons that the fresh-water pearl factories turned out. As before stated, the tariff report, on page 2, gives the number engaged in the fresh-water pearl-button industry alone at nearly 20,000. Few of the shells for the ocean pearl factories are gathered in this country, but it is evident that there must be at least three or four thousand workers engaged in the ocean shell-button factories, and altogether it is clear that there must be 23,000 to 25,000 engaged in both productions. Moreover, the hearings show that it was repeatedly testified by men who were engaged in the business that there was a total of between 20,000 and 30,000 engaged in the pearl-button business in this country. If these men do not know, who does? Yet the gentleman from North Carolina said, as I remember it—I have forgotten the exact words, because he made so many rash statements—that he would give me $100 worth of pearls, or something of that kind, if I could show the incorrectness of his statement. I have shown it beyond all controversy; but I will forgive him the debt if he will only acknowledge the error. There is, however, another promise which he made which I shall call upon him to keep.

My report states that it has been shown that the Japanese manufacturers could make buttons and sell them at a cost of less than the American manufacturer could put them on the cards. The gentleman stated over and over again that if I could find one line anywhere in the tariff report or in the hearings to support any such statement as that he would vote for the bill. Well, I assume the gentleman is a man of his word. I am going to show the correctness of that statement and I shall expect him to vote for the bill. I have always found him to do just what he promised, and I shall not expect him to go back on his bets or on any of his statements. If the gentleman will turn to the tariff report, page 25, he will find the statement in the second paragraph of that page, which is as follows:

Par. 2. Japan has recently been supplying the United States with "Dobu," shirt buttons made of a fresh-water shell known as "Dobugal," selling as low as 5 cents per gross carded and duty paid.

Now, what does that mean? It gives the size of those buttons which bear a 45 per cent duty. It meant these buttons did not cost the Japanese manufacturer 4 cents per gross. You divide 5 cents by 1.45 and you have the price—the original cost of less than 4 cents. How much does it cost the American manufacturer to put those buttons on the card? You will find on page 46 of the hearing a statement by Mr. Vetter, a manufacturer, that it costs from 6 to 7 cents per gross to put these buttons on the card and put them in the box. Of course, putting them in the box does not amount to hardly anything. A half a cent or a quarter of a cent gross would be a great big sum for putting those cards in the box. And so it costs the American manufacturer from 5½ to 6½ cents, putting it moderately, to have those buttons sewed on the card.

All this is contained in the tariff report and the hearing, and as I have shown you the Japanese manufacturers' original cost was less than 4 cents, so you see my statement was very moderate indeed when I said in the report that the Japanese cost was a little less in some instances than the American cost of putting them on the card. Now, I trust the gentleman will vote for the bill as he agreed to, because I have shown from the tariff report and from the hearings that the statement in my report that the Japanese manufacturer could make the buttons and put them on a card at a little less than the American manufacturer could have them sewed on the card was absolutely correct. Will the gentleman do it; or will he dodge and talk for another half hour, repeating the same statements after everyone present sees and knows he is wrong?

The gentleman referred to a statement in the report concerning the average wage of Japanese and American workers, and he said there was nothing of that kind in the hearings. This is another case where the gentleman could not read straight or, what is perhaps more likely, did not read at all. But a little matter of that kind does not prevent the gentleman from asserting what is contrary to the fact as positively as if he knew it to be right. I suggest that the gentleman at least glance at the exhibits which were offered as part of the hearings and which follow the oral testimony in the printed copy. Yet I fear he could not read it correctly if he did so. I will present it now.

On page 62 of the hearings are the identical figures that I quoted and a full statement giving a comparison of the average wage. It is as follows:

Comparison in wage per day between Japanese and American labor.

[These figures are taken from the best of both Japanese and American cutters on pay roll.]

JAPANESE PAY ROLL.

	Per day.
14-ligne, 3,500 pieces per day, at 23 sen (80½ sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	$0.4256
16-ligne, 3,000 pieces per day, at 25 sen (75 sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	.3906
18-ligne, 2,700 pieces per day, at 30 sen (81 sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	.4283
20-ligne, 2,500 pieces per day, at 35 sen (87½ sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	.4626
22-ligne, 2,300 pieces per day, at 37 sen (0.851 sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	.4499
22-ligne, 1,800 pieces per day, at 40 sen (0.72 sen exchange, at 52¾ cents)	.3807
Average wage per day	.4239

AMERICAN PAY ROLL.

	Per day.
14-ligne, 271 gross per week—one-sixth, 45 gross per day, at 8½ cents	$3.83
18-ligne, 281½ gross per week—one-sixth, 47 gross per day, at 9½ cents	4.46
22-ligne, 221 gross per week—one-sixth, 37 gross per day, at 11½ cents	4.25
24-ligne, 243 gross per week—one-sixth, 40½ gross per day, at 12½ cents	5.06
	17.60
Average wage per day	4.40

The above showing is from four skilled cutters from different plants.

Mr. KITCHIN. On what page is that?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is on page 62. The average wage per day for the Japanese is 42.39 cents; the average wage per day for the Americans engaged in just the same kind of work—an absolutely fair comparison about which nobody can complain, as both are engaged as cutters—the average wage of the Americans is $4.40. And on the next page it gives statements as to the amount paid in detail. Of course, this was not the average wage of everybody, nor did the reports so pretend to state, but it was a fair comparison, giving the average wage of workmen in the same kind of work, both Japanese and Americans.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean page 62 of the hearings or of the Tariff Board report?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of the hearings. You will find those identical figures that are printed in my report. And yet the gentleman from North Carolina said you could not find a line anywhere to support those figures.

I do not desire to take the time of the House further on these points. They are the principal things the gentleman insisted on so much. I have shown how wide of the mark he was on the statement which he made with reference to the cost of putting the buttons on the cards. And I have told you what his promise was. I expect as an honorable gentleman he will vote for the bill.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman has established the fact that we can make an abundance of buttons for our own consumption. Now, what effect would the introduction of these Japanese buttons into America have on the American wage scale of $4.40 for American labor?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It would put the button industry in this country out of business. They could not continue to employ men at that rate.

I do not think it is necessary that I should take the time of the House further in correcting the statements of the gentleman from North Carolina. I certainly have said enough to show that no one would be justified in accepting any of his figures until he had verified them from outside sources—in fact, that the presumption would be in the first instance that they were incorrect. He criticizes the statement that I made in the report with reference to the supply of buttons on hand. The figures are contained in the hearings. There were 13,000,000 gross on hand last May, and the oversupply was increasing at the rate of 200,000 gross per month, or 2,400,000 gross a year, with a constant increase in the importations from Japan and the factories working only on 40 per cent capacity. What the demand has been in the past is immaterial. If I had said that the American manufacturers would be entirely out of business in two years under the present tariff, my statement, while far stronger than what I made in the report, would have been fully sustained by the hearings.

Something has been said as to the percentages of the rates carried in the bill. These percentages may seem high, but when computed on the insignificant price of the Japanese buttons they amount to nothing to the consumer. If the whole tariff rate was added to the price, as it will not be by reason of foreign competition, it would amount to nothing to the consumer. The increase would be less than a cent on the cost of a shirt and only a few cents on a dress that had larger buttons. Neither the manufacturer nor the retailer would increase the price on account of it. With these same rates in the Payne bill the prices of buttons decreased instead of increased. While we may not expect the price to be lowered under the operations of this bill, we have no reason to expect the price to be higher. The only effect will be that we will use American buttons instead of Japanese and American labor will be employed instead of that of Japan. The consumer will still buy buttons at the same price per card and garments at the same price as before, and the American workman will be happy, prosperous, and contented instead of being, as he is now, out of employment, working on half time, or without wages enough to give him the comforts of life. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from North Carolina want to consume a little time?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will wait for a few minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL].

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to use one minute to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial published in the Buffalo Journal, in my district, on August 7, and written by my good friend, Mr. Mithun, the proprietor and editor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SCHALL. I want it read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. FORDNEY yielded me one minute.

Mr. BLANTON. On what subject is it?

Mr SCHALL. On the high cost of living.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the editorial referred to:

It looks like another war against the black, at least in Chicago and at the seat of Government. Evidently the people of Washington and Chicago do not believe that the peace treaty was made to affect troubles between the white and the black.

The conduct of some officers at Farm No. 2, a prison camp in France, is little short of scandalous. It is the blackest blot yet upon our fair history. It is worse than what the Huns did, for they mistreated not their own but other people. Our officers have most cruelly and shamefully mistreated their own kind. The only consolation, however, is that the deeds have been committed without official orders, without the knowledge, we believe, of officers worthy of their titles. It was the act of some brute who wanted to show his authority, and may the Government now go to the bottom of the shameful act and hang every one who is guilty—yes, hanging is ten times too good for them.

Just now our National Capitol is all worked up over the cost of living; yes, just now, after the profiteers have filled their pockets so full that they are bursting and after the common people have been bled white. The air is full of schemes and proposals, but they all seem to aim at wheat. Shall we take off the Government price on wheat, how shall we do it, and so on and so forth? This seems to be all that they think about or the dailies write of. The whole thing makes us tired. In the first place, wheat is not so terribly out of the way in price, other things considered, and bread is not all that people need to live. What about sugar, cotton, coal, and thousands of other things twice as high as wheat? This cry on wheat is nothing but a camouflage. Give us cheaper shoes, clothes, coal, and we are willing to pay and the farmers will be willing to sell wheat cheaper. Now, just take shoes, for instance. In what proportion are they sold to the cost of hides? Why and where does it all go, when the blueberry pickers sell a whole bushel of berries for 75 cents that costs us about $25 a bushel, and that in spite of the fact that the local dealers only make a few cents on it. It is only one case, and a small one we grant, but by the eternal it serves the purpose, and it is the same with all of this high-priced stuff. Leave the farmer and his wheat alone for a while and turn your attention—you Congressmen and investigating committees, we mean—to some bigger graft than the wheat graft or you will have a revolution before long. We are not the kind to howl on the Government, but the war has made thousands of millionaires overnight by pure steal, and they are not satisfied yet. You are afraid to tackle the real trouble and so try to pacify the people by making a stir about the price of wheat. It is ridiculous. The wheat trouble has hurt no one seriously nor has the farmer become a millionaire. You all know who has made the money and who is robbing the public, and why in the name of your sworn duty do you not go after the real thing?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the real gist of the controversy and the question in dispute is this: Is the Congress of the United States going to give aid to a great industry in this country, or are we going to transfer it to Japan? That is what we must now decide.

The Tariff Board report shows from statistics of the Bureau of the Census for the year 1914, which are the latest available, that nearly $20,000,000 is invested in this country in industries engaged solely in the manufacture of buttons, and that their output in 1914, in round numbers, was valued at $20,000,000 or $21,000,000.

There has been some controversy between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] about the number of people employed in the pearl button industry in this country. The Tariff Board report shows, according to the census report of 1914, that there were 15,710 people, I believe, employed in the domestic pearl button industry.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The tariff report figures refer only to the fresh-water pearls.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and in 1914—five years ago.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are something over 10,000 people engaged in gathering of shells alone.

Mr. FORDNEY. A gentleman engaged in the pearl button business appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and said that in his opinion there were 30,000 people employed in that industry. Whose report are we going to accept, the one as to the employees for 1914 or now? I am ready to take the statement of a gentleman engaged in the business, who has his money invested in the industry.

But here is the point—I would call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to this fact: The pearl button industry constitutes 35 per cent of the total production of buttons in the United States, valued at more than $20,000,000. Wages in Japan, as shown by the Tariff Board report and by information presented by other gentlemen to the Committee on Ways and Means, amount to 14 cents a day, and Japan is now our chief competitor in the pearl button business, while in this country in May this year the wages ranged as high as $4.22.

I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina and men who are opposed to this bill if they will go to the country on the claim that they would destroy the $4.22 a day labor in this country and transfer the industry to Japan, where wages of 14 cents a day are paid in the pearl buttons trade. I believe charity should begin at home. I was sent here to represent American labor and not Japanese labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Twenty million gross of buttons were consumed in the United States last year. The importations are now coming in very heavily from Japan. This industry in Japan has sprung up since the war in Europe began, four and one-half years ago. Before that time our competition was largely from Europe—from Germany and from Austria-Hungary. Fresh-water pearl buttons are made in the States of New York, Iowa, New Jersey, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Kansas, Arkansas, Ohio, West Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Oklahoma, Missouri, and Massachusetts, but the center of the industry is in Iowa, and that State leads in the production of buttons and blanks.

The gentleman from North Carolina ridiculed the report made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that fishermen were included in the number of employees he mentioned. What fishermen? Fishermen gathering clamshells, from which buttons are made. Clamshells are the raw material of the pearl-button industry. How can you make pearl buttons without the raw material? It is quite true that the men who gather clamshells from the rivers and lakes of this country are a part of the pearl-button industry. Of course they are. But the gentleman uses arguments before the Members of the House as he does down in North Carolina before a jury. He ridicules somebody's statement. He does not get down to facts, but injects humor to evade the real issue.

My good friends, will we sustain this industry in this country, or are we going to transfer it to Japan? At the present time many blanks are made in Japan, imported into this country, and purchased by the domestic pearl-button manufacturers. Why? Because blanks can be purchased from Japan and China to-day, from which these buttons are made, at a less cost than our cost of labor in cutting the blanks from the shells, not including any of the overhead expenses nor the cost of the shells themselves, which to-day is something like $70 a ton. We buy the blanks already made for less money than the labor costs in cutting the shells in this country.

It is absolutely ridiculous to think that the rate of duty this bill imposes upon the consumers of this country would justify Members in opposing it. It would be absurd to oppose it. If the duty was all to be added to the price, it would amount to but 2 cents a gross. How many buttons do the people of this country use? A quarter of a gross per capita per year; 15 or 20 cents a year for each person who uses an average quantity of pearl buttons. Would you, my Democratic friends from the South, transfer to Japan and China this great growing and important industry, employing somewhere between 15,000 and 30,000 men in the United States with $20,000,000 capital invested? Would you transfer that industry to a foreign country and furnish employment to the Japanese and Chinese for 20 cents per capita, even assuming that the amount of the duty is added to the cost of the buttons to the consumer? It is not. Go down town to-day and buy a dozen pearl buttons of any size—16, 18, 20, or 24 line buttons, the ordinary button used on the ordinary wearing apparel of the people—and how much less do we pay because we are getting these buttons from China and Japan now than was paid when there were no importations from Japan and China? The wholesaler buys them cheaper. What does this button cost? The Department of Commerce shows that all the pearl buttons imported last year from all the countries of the world, chiefly from China and Japan, averaged 28 cents a gross—144 buttons for 28 cents. If the duty proposed in this bill were added to that price, what will it be? You will add 25 or 30 cents a gross, 2 cents a dozen, or 2 or 3 or 4 cents, or whatever it may be per dozen, owing to the size and value of the buttons.

Are you going to destroy this industry at home, I say, for the sake of that 4 or 5 cents and send your mony abroad—$20,000,000 or $30,000,000 a year—for the benefit of Japanese and Chinese labor because you do not believe in protection to American labor? American labor is what is being protected by this bill.

I wish to repeat, as I have often stated, that the capital of the country employing labor cares nothing about protection except a sufficient amount of duty to warrant them in paying an American scale of wages to the American workingman as compared with the scale of wages that is paid to the laborer abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is all this protection is for. And yet men who oppose laws of this kind say that such laws create monopoly, that such laws are for the benefit of the capitalists solely. That is nonsense, gentlemen. That is not a fair argument. It is not true. If you could give the pearl-button manufacturer labor at 14 cents a day in this country, such as the manufacturers of pearl buttons have in Japan and China—and the foreign labor works 11½ hours a day right now—what would the manufacturer care about protection? Do you want American labor to work for 14 cents a day?

There is one thing certain. If you vote against this bill you have one of two desires: You either want the scale of American labor brought down to their standard, or you want to transfer the industry to China or Japan. Get away from that argument if you can. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the question as to who shall make the buttons for the buttoning of the frocks and the pinafores, not to mention the shirts of the country, may not seem very important; and yet this bill involves the whole question of the tariff and of protection. Shall the Nation do its own work or shall the work of the Nation be done by the underpaid peoples of the Orient? Shall we continue to gather salt-water shells in America? Shall we continue to grow fresh-water mussels in America? And shall we make these products into buttons in America, or shall they be made by Japanese? And when you state that question, you state the whole tariff question. Shall America do its work or shall we allow the oriental, with his low rate of pay and his low standard of living, to do it? In that event, who is going to furnish employment for the people of America, and how shall we maintain the American wage rate and the American standard of living?

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] pettifogged a lot, in a way not very becoming to the leader of a great party, it occurred to me, when he spoke of relative costs of production of buttons in Japan and America. Well, after all is said and done, one does not need to split hairs when it comes to the question of competition between American labor and oriental labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only five minutes, but I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman is embarrassed in speaking to 23 Republicans, I will get him a quorum here, if he wants it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is the 19 Democrats who need to hear what I have to say and not the Republicans, whatever the number may be. I come to call sinners, not the righteous, to repentance. [Laughter.] Republicans believe in the maintenance of American wage scales. They believe in the maintenance of American standards. They believe in allowing America to be independent of the world and to maintain herself. Do you gentlemen on the Democratic side believe that? You will have an opportunity in just a moment to say whether you do or not. If the Japanese are to make our goods for a few cents a day, as compared with present American wage scales, what is the American going to do, and how are American wages and the American standard of living to be maintained? Never before in the history of the country was that question so tremendously important as it is this day when we are trying to advance our standards, when our wage scale is higher than ever before and still rising. Never before has this question been put up to the American people as it is to-day. Do you believe in maintaining American standards, or do you believe in reducing American standards by opening American markets to the competition of the underpaid, low-living standard laborers of the Orient?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry, but I have not time.

These are industries that particularly appeal to us, for they give employment to the farmer's boy out yonder in the Middle West. They allow the establishment of small industries in sections of the country far removed from the great cities. They furnish the ideal character of industry for a country like ours, industries scattered broadcast over the land, giving employment to those who are in the main not employed otherwise. The question you have got to decide to-day is, Are you on the Lord's side, and are you for America and American standards, or are you for Japan and Japanese standards? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. We have only one other speaker. I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina to go ahead.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question for information, but he did not have time to yield. I realize that.

Every industry in America as it comes along has its advocates not only to claim but to demonstrate by their figures that they are unable to compete with the foreign and pauper labor either of Europe or the Orient. What I want to know is this: This is a great country, producing an excess over its consumption to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. That excess must be sold abroad. Now, if every industry here is unable to compete with any foreign country, and must exclude from our markets the products of its competitors, where on earth are we going to find exchange products to come into our country in payment for the products that we wish to send abroad? [Applause.] The truth is that the Republican principle, if applied individually to every industry in the United States, would mean that none of them can stand competition, and they want from 100 to 300 per cent protection, because they say they love American labor. Yet these protected industries build up the millionaires, and we have investigated labor conditions in some of these protected industries where starvation of American laborers was the rule. I remember we investigated the woolen mills of Massachusetts when they had the highest tariff they ever had on the statute books, and yet it was shown that the laborers were unable to send their little children to school, and those children of laborers in the woolen industry could not wear woolen underwear because their parents did not receive enough to enable them to buy it. [Applause.]

Yet every time an industry comes up its advocates not only claim but prove by some kind of figures that they can not compete with production abroad and must have protection for the benefit, they say, of labor. But if we have no imports, where are you going to get your commerce for this country? You want to build up a great merchant marine and send it across the sea. What are they going to bring back to this country, if you build your tariff wall so high that no manufacturer in a foreign land can send his products here? Oh, you want to leave the burden of carrying on the commerce of this country to the workers of the farm, and then you will say that the farmer may send his products abroad because they can not be grown abroad; that we can send our surplus cotton and grain abroad; but what are we going to bring back in exchange?

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If I have time, certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. If we build up an American merchant marine, and our vessels are obliged to go empty either way, I want them to come back empty.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. If you build up an American merchant marine at all, it must both go and come laden with the commerce of the world. [Applause.] The gentleman knows that his party tried for 60 years to build up an American merchant marine by every manipulation of the protective-tariff theory, and by exclusion of foreign vessels from our coastwise trade. But I do not want to go into that subject. I want to say this: We are a great Nation, and we hope to deal with the nations of the earth; but your policy would exclude their products from this country, and by doing that you will exclude our products from their countries, but you do not seem to know it. You do not seem to think of it. You harp on the laboring man, but your heart is with the capitalist who piles up his millions by the favor of the tariff. If the Republican Party is not lost to reason, they know that everything we sell must find a buyer, and that if we refuse to buy anything from foreign lands then foreign lands can buy nothing from us. When we owed vast debts to foreign countries, as we did before the war, the nations we owed could buy our products with the interest we owed them. But now they will owe us a great balance on interest payments, a balance of, perhaps, half a billion of dollars. How can they pay us that balance and then buy our surplus products if we buy nothing of their products? And yet the Republican Party would build their tariff wall so high that they will shut out the products of the industry of all the rest of the world. That would be isolation of America, indeed! [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 339 of the tariff act, approved October 3, 1913, be amended as follows:

By striking therefrom after the words "buttons of shell and pearl" the words "in sizes 26 lines and larger, 25 per cent ad valorem; below 26 lines 45 per cent ad valorem," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "finished or partly finished, 1½ cents per line per gross and 15 per cent ad valorem; pearl or shell button blanks, not turned, faced, or drilled, 1 cent per line per gross and 15 per cent ad valorem"; and also inserting after the words "finished or unfinished" the words "not made from pearl or shell," so that said section will read as follows——

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the figures and words "1½ cents" and insert in lieu thereof "three-quarters of a cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, of course I have no hope that this Republican House will adopt that amendment. That is entirely too high a tariff to levy on any necessity or upon any other thing in this country. But I want to give the Republicans a chance to do something in accordance with their professed principles and at the same time will not inflict so heavy a burden on the people throughout the country who use pearl or shell buttons. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] are correct, and the testimony of these manufacturers and producers of pearl buttons themselves are correct, the amendment I offer will give 150 per cent ad valorem tariff on every button they claim is now coming in. This, of course, is outrageously high, but it is 50 per cent lower than the rate in the bill. Take a 16-line button, at three-quarters of a cent the tariff would be 12 cents per gross, and yet they tell us this morning that Japan is shipping in buttons at 5 cents a gross and paying the tariff on them. If that be true, a tariff of three-quarters of a cent will be equivalent on that kind of button to 240 per cent ad valorem. The rate in the bill would be 480 per cent. Mr. Slacker testified that the basic button now being imported into the country is laid or could be laid down here at 7 cents. Three-quarters of a cent gives something over 150 per cent tariff on a 7-cent button. This is on the idea that the manufacturers stated the facts, that the understanding of the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Iowa is correct; but I want to say to you that such testimony and such understanding are absolutely at variance with the facts.

I can not understand how a man in this House, or any man, can come before the committee—an intelligent and truth-loving man—and make these naked, bald statements in face of the fact that the reports of the Treasury Department, the reports of the Department of Commerce, show every gross of buttons imported and the import value before paying any tariff, commission, or any freight from Japan here, and that the import value, instead of being 5 cents or 7 cents, is over 20 cents per gross. But these gentlemen come and tell this House, and tell the Republican Members, in order to get this tariff bill through, that these Japanese buttons, against which they want a bill to protect the American factories, are coming in here in floods at 5 and 7 cents and that our factories can not compete with them.

Let me say, as I said the other day, that they are not flooding this country with buttons; they are not taking the market from our factories. Only 10 per cent of all the pearl or shell buttons used in the United States come from abroad, and our factories—the factories up in New York, Wisconsin, Iowa, and other States—sell in this country 90 per cent of the buttons used in this country. Gentlemen, is that undue competition?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down. The gentleman talks about the terrific and terrible cost to the people because of this duty. If he will take the last report of the Department of Commerce for the month of June, on page 10, he will find that the pearl buttons imported into this country were valued at 24 cents a gross. I have stated to the House that the average person only uses about a quarter of a gross of pearl buttons a year, and that 6 cents worth of buttons, on which we are placing a duty of 2½ cents, does not add anything to the cost of the garment to the consumer.

References are made to 16-line buttons. In the measurement of buttons a line is one-fortieth of an inch, and 16 lines means sixteen-fortieths of an inch, 40 per cent of an inch, which is a small button, and the idea of saying that the bill should fail because we are imposing such an enormous tax upon people for the few pearl buttons they wear is ridiculous. Compare the wage per day of $4.22 paid people employed in making buttons in the United States with the 14 cents a day paid the Japs across the sea. It is absolutely absurd for any gentleman to attempt to go to the country and show the people that they are suffering because of this heavy tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman from Michigan dispute the statement made by the gentleman from North Carolina that we export annually about $750,000 worth of these pearl buttons?

Mr. FORDNEY. During the war we did export buttons to Europe, because they were killing people over there and making munitions and not buttons.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But before the war started?

Mr. FORDNEY. And we imported from China and Japan that same year twelve hundred thousand dollars' worth of pearl buttons.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But before the war started is it not a fact that we exported about $500,000 worth of buttons annually?

Mr. FORDNEY. We might export——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did we?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, let me answer the question. We have exported only certain kinds of buttons that the people wanted over there that they did not make, not the average pearl button.

Mr. KITCHIN. But our exportation of pearl buttons was to South America and other countries, not to Europe.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman want the House to understand that we were so prosperous in the business that we were exporting all over the world and paying $4.22 a day for labor while the Japanese were paying but 14 cents a day? If so, go to the country upon that theory, and I will go with you.

Mr. KITCHIN. There were $751,000 worth of pearl or shell buttons exported for the 11 months ending May 30, 1919.

Mr. FORDNEY. According to the Department of Commerce, exportations of pearl buttons were not of sufficient importance to merit separate classification until 1918, and reports for that year show that only one-third of the buttons exported were made of pearl. The report of the Tariff Commission on the button industry states that for the years 1910 to 1914 exportations of buttons averaged $650,000 per year in value, and the commission estimates that one-third of the buttons so exported were of pearl, so it will be seen that the exportation of pearl buttons was in the vicinity of $200,000 per year rather than $600,000. In 1918, the first year pearl buttons were classified separately, commerce reports show that Canada took $128,000 of pearl buttons and $673,000 of other buttons. For a number of years Canada has taken half of all the buttons exported from this country. It is interesting to note in this connection that during the month of June, 1919, the exportation of pearl buttons fell to the insignificant sum of $27,000 all told, while exportations of other buttons amounted to $287,000. In that month 91.4 per cent of the buttons exported were not made of pearl. This indicates how far astray a man goes if he quotes exportations of buttons of all kinds and assumes that they are pearl buttons. It is absurd to think that American pearl buttons can compete with those made in Japan.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate is exhausted, and that the gentleman from Texas is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has made the motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. DOWELL. But a motion to strike out the last word is only in order if an amendment has not been offered. An amendment has been offered to this paragraph, and it has been fully debated——

Mr. BLANTON. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. DOWELL. Therefore the gentleman is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Texas to move to strike out the last word of the amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

Mr. DOWELL. When an amendment is offered to a paragraph and debate is exhausted, then it is not in order to speak upon the amendment, and the rule provides that when there is no amendment a motion to strike out the last word may be made, and that is the custom that has prevailed here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The amendment is to strike out the last word of the amendment, and the Chair thinks that that is in order.

Mr. DOWELL. I hope the Chair will examine the rule upon that question——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the rule upon the question.

Mr. DOWELL. Because I think the gentleman is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, before that is done, I move that all debate upon this amendment close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan that all debate upon the amendment close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. FORDNEY] admitted that the average per capita amount of buttons used in the United States was 20 cents. That is, that each person in the United States averaged up uses about 20 cents' worth of buttons a year. The buttons covered by this bill are the kind that poor people use, and are not the kind used by people of affluence, hence the poor people each use even more than 20 cents' worth of such buttons per year.

Mr. FORDNEY. I made a mistake. I think it is only 10.

Mr. BLANTON. I am taking the chairman's original statement for that. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] would have us believe that because this tariff bill does not involve such a great amount, that therefore, forsooth, we should pass the bill; and yet it will be admitted that it means an annual sum of $5,000,000 taken out of the pockets of the poor people who use these particular buttons and placed into the pockets of the rich manufacturers who pay Republican campaign expenses. If this were the only item through which the people were called upon to help the rich Republican manufacturers, it might not make so much difference, but there are 4,000 such items in the tariff law, and at this time it has become clearly apparent that our Republican colleagues now in control of the House have indifferently postponed indefinitely action on any soldiers' relief measure and are wasting the time of Congress in considering and passing one by one separate bills subsidizing and monopolizing the rich manufacturers of each and every one of these 4,000 items covered by the tariff. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] claimed that this bill involved the least amount, hence since it means a subsidy of $5,000,000 each year, we may therefore reasonably conclude that more than said sum will be put into the pockets of manufacturers annually on each and every one of the 4,000 items. Figuring even the lowest minimum of $5,000,000, it means that our Republican colleagues through the passage of these innumerable tariff measures, all class legislation purely, are granting subsidies amounting to $20,000,000,000 raised and collected through a tax upon commodities mostly used by the poor people of the land not able to pay same and placed in the pockets of rich Republican manufacturers on the 4,000 items in the tariff. But why should Republicans worry? The poor people furnish no campaign funds. The rich manufacturers come across liberally without stint or limitation, not even requiring an accounting. This amazing situation demonstrates the want of interest that the Republican Members of this House have in this bill upon which we are about to vote in a few minutes. Taking $5,000,000 out of the people's pockets and placing it in the pockets of the manufacturers apparently does not amount to anything, and that is the reason that when the distinguished chairman of the committee was addressing Congressmen upon this measure he could not have more than 30 Members of the Republican Party on the floor to hear him.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield. That was the reason that I felt sorry for the majority leader of this House [Mr. MONDELL] when he could not get more than 23 Members of the Republican Party to stay in their seats and listen to his talk on this measure, and that is the reason that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who is the best-informed man, they say, on the pearl-button industry, had to talk to less than 30 men on the Republican side in discussing this measure. The majority leader felt so chagrined at having the above called to the attention of the country that he tried to help out his absent Republican colleagues by insinuating in his reply to my proposal to get him a quorum that the number of Republicans present was indefinite, he using the expression "yes; 23 or 53 or 83," when, as a matter of fact, there were exactly 23 Republicans on the floor of the House at the time I expressed regret that he was forced to speak to empty seats on the Republican side.

And, Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to call attention to the fact that time and again I have protested against the House of Representatives attempting to do business with a little handful of Members present, and for some reason the distinguished Speaker of the House, for whom I have the profoundest regard and respect, has held that I was out of order and that I could not call attention to the fact that there were less than 20 Republican Members on the floor. Likewise the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas] has ruled me out of order and held that I could not publicly call attention to the fact that only a very few Republicans were on the floor when important legislation was under consideration. I have hunted in vain for some rule requiring this information, interesting to the general public, to be kept secret, but have not found any. I feel sure that both the Speaker and the chairman of the Rules Committee have some good reason for depriving the public of this information, and I feel sure their action meets with the approbation of the Republican campaign committee, whose cause it naturally affects. Under the circumstances I hope that the general public will understand in the future that whenever I rise and demand a quorum it is because there are only a few Republicans present, and that I would mention the exact number were I allowed to do so by the Speaker and chairman of the Rules Committee.

Whether our Republican colleagues are interested or not, the poor people of the United States are very much interested in the fact that within a very few minutes we are to vote on this important Republican tariff measure, which is to take from their pockets $5,000,000 annually, at the lowest minimum possible, and place same in the pockets of rich men who do not need it, yet we have less than 35 Members of the Republican Party in their seats on the House floor at this time——

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman can follow his usual custom and have a roll call.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I will make the point of no quorum directly, and then you will see my good moose-hunting friend from Minnesota, the incomparable Republican whip [Mr. KNUTSON], get busy and round up the cloakrooms, restaurants, highways and byways, and by the time the Chair can slowly count he will round up all the stray Republicans possible, who with our stanch Democratic stand-bys will aggregate less than a hundred Members present. Mr. Chairman, the few desultory remarks I have made were merely preliminary to a point of order I now make, namely, that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. MONDELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 7705, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he caused the roll to the called, whereupon 217 Members answered to their names, and he presented the list of absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee will resume its session.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Texas is withdrawn and the vote is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. KITCHIN) there were—ayes 56, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment on page 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the figure and word "1 cent" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "one-half of 1 cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this simply reduces the specific duty in the bill from 1 cent to one-half of a cent a line. That makes on a 16-line button a duty of 8 cents per gross and on an 18-line button 9 cents per gross. This amendment makes the duty entirely too high, but it is so much better than the rate in the bill that I offer it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 339. Buttons of vegetable ivory in sizes 36 lines and larger, 35 per cent ad valorem; below 36 lines, 45 per cent ad valorem; buttons of shell and pearl, finished or partly finished, 1½ cents per line per gross and 15 per cent ad valorem; pearl or shell button blanks, not turned, faced, or drilled, 1 cent per line per gross and 15 per cent ad valorem; agate buttons and shoe buttons, 15 per cent ad valorem; parts of buttons and button molds or blanks, finished or unfinished, not made from pearl or shell, and all collar and cuff buttons and studs composed wholly of bone, mother-of-pearl, ivory, or agate, all the foregoing and buttons not specially provided for in this section, 40 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I am sending up two amendments and ask that they be read together, because one reduces the rate on pearl buttons and the other on shell. I ask unanimous consent that they be considered together.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the two amendments be presented and considered together. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 14, strike out the figure and word "1½ cents."
Page 2, line 6, strike out the figure and word "1 cent" and insert in lieu thereof the words "one-half of a cent."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, just to keep the record straight, I desire to make a few remarks with respect to the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. I laid down several propositions last Friday when we had this matter under consideration, and I cited the pages of the hearings and the Tariff Board report to confirm them, and I made some observations upon the inaccuracies of the splendid report of the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN]. I said that if he would point out one line or word of evidence before the committee or in the Tariff Commission's report sustaining either one of his several statements in the report which I had criticized I would vote for this bill. Well, the gentleman had all day Saturday and all day Monday—I hope he went to church on Sunday, if not he had all day Sunday—to go over the hearings and go over the report and find out whether he could quote me or the House any evidence taken before the committee or any evidence in the Tariff Commission's report sustaining a single one of these statements in his report which I had criticized as unfounded and incorrect.

I say now that he utterly failed to do so in his speech a few moments ago, though in the beginning of his speech he said he would do so and was going to get "Mr. KITCHIN's vote"; that "Mr. KITCHIN" said "there is no evidence of 25,000 or 30,000 people being engaged in this industry." The only thing he said this morning was that there were that many engaged. He cited no evidence except the lawyer's statement which I quoted the other day. Gentlemen, of course there are not, and I want to suggest to the gentleman that if there are 25,000 people engaged in the industry and the industry pays an average wage of $4.40 per day, according to his report, which he said this morning was correct, it would take, with 300 working days in a year, $33,000,000 to pay for the labor alone. Now, if it takes $33,000,000 to pay for the labor alone, and the total value—selling value—of the whole annual output of the industry is a little less than $10,000,000—but we will call it $10,000,000—where in the world does the pearl or shell button industry, whose entire capital is less than $4,000,000, get that extra $23,000,000 to pay for that labor? If there are 25,000 people engaged in the industry, as he says, and they are getting, as he says, an average wage of $4.40, requiring therefor $300,000,000 annually to pay for the labor alone, with the selling value of the total output, gentlemen will see that if every dollar of this sale went to pay the labor they would lack $23,000,000 of having enough to settle the labor account.

This very statement itself shows that they do not have 25,000 people engaged in the industry or that the wages can not average $4.40 per day. If so many are employed, the wages can not average $1.50 a day. The truth is that Mr. GREEN is mistaken both as to the number engaged in the industry and as to the average daily wage.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman knows that he is perverting my remarks. The $4.40 was for the cutters.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right. If the gentleman is correct in that statement, then he should have stated it in his report that cutters got $4.40. His report is silent as to cutters. It had no qualification, but stated expressly that the average workman in the factories in this country got $4.40 a day. The main contention was, the very base of his plea was, that the workman here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I supposed I would have five minutes on each of the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, gentlemen, the plea for this bill is—the plea that Mr. MONDELL made, that Mr. FORDNEY made, and that Mr. GREEN made this morning, and which Mr. HULL has made—that these Japanese get from 14 cents to 42 cents a day and our workman was getting $4.40 a day. The gentleman from Iowa put that in his report. Let me read from his report:

The evidence taken by the subcommittee and set out in the printed copy of the hearings shows that the average wage of the Japanese worker in the industry to-day is 42.39 cents, while the average pay for the same workman here is $4.40.

He now says "cutters get $4.40."

I told him if he found a word or line in any evidence before the committee or in the Tariff Board's report to the effect that the average pay of our workmen in the industry was $4.40 per day I would vote for the bill. I told him there was not a word of evidence to that effect. What did he cite me to this morning? Not to the evidence or the testimony given before our committee or before the Tariff Board, but to a printed statement filed by some officer of the Button Manufacturers' Association after the hearings or the testimony was over, and this was printed in the back of the hearings. And in that statement this officer says the average pay not for all the workmen but for the cutters—the cutters alone, and they are the highest paid of all—was $4.40. Mr. GREEN did not tell us in his report that $4.40 was the highest wage, and that was paid to the cutters only. There are grinders and sorters and polishers and other workmen in the industry; but he selects cutters, the highest, without letting us know it in his report. That is what I want to call attention to.

So I can not vote for Mr. GREEN's pearl-button bill, because there is not a line of evidence showing the statements in his report to be true—the statements I criticized. If he had read one page further in the statement of this officer of the association, he would have found that the average of all the workmen was from $2 and $2.50 to $3, as it gives the wages of other workmen in addition to those of the cutters.

Mr. FORDNEY. Does not the gentleman know that the report shows the pearl-button industry is only running 40 per cent capacity?

Mr. KITCHIN. They state now that it runs but 40 per cent of the time—some of the manufacturers do——

Mr. FORDNEY. All of them.

Mr. KITCHIN. All that testified. Why, they have piled over 13,000,000 gross of buttons on their shelves——

Mr. FORDNEY. They are low-grade buttons.

Mr. KITCHIN. All grades of buttons.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell you why they have piled those up since March. Why? Because they thought they could continue to make them and pile them up, and come to this Republican House and Senate and get a tariff of from 200 to 500 per cent, and thereby increase the value of the buttons on hand from 50 to over 100 per cent. And that is the reason they have piled them up and will not sell them on the market. They piled them up like the tungsten-one producers piled up their product and like the tungsten importers stored their importations up in New York, in order to get the enhanced value which Republicans are trying to give them by tariff bills. This bill, if passed, will increase the value of those 13,000,000 gross of buttons over $1,000,000. They are piling up and waiting for this extra $1,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said in order to keep the record straight he wanted to make a few remarks. In order to keep the bill straight, I ask for a vote on the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to an error, according to the print which the Clerk has. The "1½ cents" appears in line 7 and the "1 cent" appears in line 9.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be corrected. In line 7 I want to put "three-fourths cent" and in line 9 "one-half cent."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made. The vote is now on the amendments.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 77.

So the amendments were rejected.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, there are no amendments to the bill. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FESS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7705) to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl, had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, with the recommendation that the bill be passed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. On that the gentleman moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 126, nays 93, answered "present" 5, not voting 204, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SMALL, for 14 days, on account of public work in his district.

To Mr. BRUMBAUGH, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. WELTY, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. SMITHWICK, for one day, on account of illness in his family.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. THOMPSON of Ohio, be excused indefinitely on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies papers in the following cases, no adverse reports having been made thereon:

William M. Metzger, H. R. 13380, Sixty-fifth Congress.

William Bell, H. R. 14480, Sixty-third Congress; H. R. 3205, Sixty-fourth Congress; and H. R. 2667, Sixty-fifth Congress.

ZINC ORES.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6238, to provide a tariff and to obtain revenue in connection with the metal contents of zinc ores and products thereof, and repealing existing laws fixing the rates of duty on such commodities.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 6238, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, it has been arranged between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and myself that there shall be not to exceed 1 hour and 30 minutes general debate, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] and the other half by myself. I ask unanimous consent that that arrangement be carried out.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that there be not to exceed 1 hour and 30 minutes of general debate, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] and the other half by himself.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it proper to make such an arrangement in the Committee of the Whole? Should it not have been made in the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It can be made in the committee only by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLANTON. I think this matter ought to have been attended to in the House and not in the committee, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] for one hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chief object of this bill is to protect zinc-ore mining. It is true the bill carries protection to the manufacture of zinc, but this would be unnecessary except for the duties carried in the bill to protect the mining of zinc ore. The members of the committee will understand that zinc in a manufactured form is commonly called spelter. I suppose everyone knows that. Zinc-ore mining in the United States is an old industry. It is extensively carried on in Missouri, Kansas, Tennessee, Oklahoma, Utah, Idaho, Wisconsin, and other parts of the United States.

Zinc ore is extensively mined in many of the countries of the world—in Mexico, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Spain, in many of the countries of South and Central America, and in China and Japan.

It is true, however, that the most dangerous competitor with the United States in the mining of zinc ore is our neighbor, the Republic of Mexico.

Prior to the war the domestic production and consumption about equaled each other. No zinc ore was imported into the United States up to 1904. At that time the industry in this country had invested in it hundreds of millions of capital, and it employed tens of thousands of people. In 1904 the importations were 2,000 tons, coming chiefly from Mexico. They increased rapidly in the succeeding years. In 1907 from 2,000 tons in 1904 it increased to 100,000 tons. In 1909 it had increased to 113,000 tons.

The danger to the industry in this country from imports and the competition thus brought about was so injuriously affecting it that in 1909 a Republican Congress passed the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, carrying the same duty on zinc ore that is carried in this bill. It gave the same protection and the same rates of protection to the manufacturers of zinc as are in this bill. During the years 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912, under the protection afforded by the Payne-Aldrich law, this industry was prosperous. The product at that time sold as high as $67.50 a ton of 60 per cent ore, which is the kind we make in southwest Missouri, Oklahoma, and Kansas. Sixty-seven dollars and fifty cents a ton was the greatest price that the commodity had ever brought. While the industry was in that condition, the laboring men working in it happy, contented, and prosperous, the Democratic Party met at Baltimore in 1912; and I want to read to you a threat which they issued against the capital and labor employed in zinc mining. That great convention said:

> We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue, and we demand that the collection of such taxes shall be limited to the necessities of government honestly and economically administered.

While this ore was bringing the highest price in history, while the tens of thousands of workingmen employed in the mining of zinc were earning the best wages in the history of that industry, while they were supporting and educating their children, building churches and schoolhouses, and contributing their portion to make America great and prosperous, the Democratic Party met in Baltimore and declared that it would violate the Constitution of the United States to protect the workingmen in this or any other industry in competition with the low wages prevailing in Mexico, Japan, China, or any other foreign country.

At the time that declaration was made wages of the workingman in this industry were such as rivaled those recited by the gentleman from Texas the other day and of which he complained. We all remember that he called attention of the House to the fact that the laboring men on the railroads—brakemen and firemen—were some of them earning $300 a month, and he complained that the sum named was greater than that paid Texas circuit judges. I want to say to you that many of these Americans working in the zinc-ore industry in 1909, 1910, 1911, and 1912, under the protection afforded by Republican laws, were earning wages that rivaled those paid to Texas circuit judges, and the gentleman from Texas, I know, will be greatly alarmed to hear those workingmen are doing so well. Nothing seems to give him more concern.

Now, I want to say, in the face of the fact that laboring men are earning such wages, the Republicans do not get excited; nothing pleases them more than that very fact. They work and fight to help them improve their wages and protect them against lower wages by duties levied upon the products of low wages. Many of us on this side are acquainted with the brakemen and firemen referred to the other day by the gentleman from Texas as earning $300 per month. Many of us on this side know a few circuit judges of Texas—not many judges. We know some of them, and the Republicans on this side of the House will not get excited, as I said, because workingmen under the Republican principle of protection are earning more than those judges. A great many of us think the workingmen we know earn and are worth more than the Texas circuit judges we know. [Laughter and applause.]

In 1913 the Congress elected on that platform that said it violated the Constitution of the United States to equalize the opportunity of one of our own people with the Mexicans or the Chinese or the Japanese met in this Capitol, and what did it do?

It proceeded to do what was threatened. They will now admit it was hard on the country and on the capital invested in zinc mining. They are forced to admit that they placed a great American industry, necessary to the prosperity and welfare of the country, in foreign hands.

All they can claim is that out of the wreck they wrought they saved the Constitution by refusing protection to labor and capital.

They repealed this Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act that carried protection to the workingmen in this zinc-ore-mining industry.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. On page 3 of the bill this language appears:

Zinc-bearing ores of all kinds, including calamine, containing less than 10 per cent of zinc shall be admitted free of duty.

I was wondering why an ore carrying that small percentage was not subject to the same duty as ore carrying a higher percentage of zinc.

Mr. McPHERSON. The object of that provision is this: Many ores carry a small percentage of zinc. Copper and silver bearing ores contain some zinc. No zinc ore primarily for the purpose of extracting zinc is brought in carrying less than 10 per cent, because it is not practical to reclaim the lower rate. But say silver is brought in that contains 10 per cent or less of zinc. The zinc will all be lost in smelting. It is burned up, and especially when zinc is a by-product of other ores and is lost in smelting it would not be right to compel such zinc to pay the duty; so that this committee, as in the Payne-Aldrich case, exempted from the provisions of this act ores carrying less than 10 per cent of metallic content for the reason that those ores could not be reclaimed in the process of manufacture and smelting.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not now. I have referred to the fact that the Payne-Aldrich tariff was repealed in October, 1913, and instead of the rates carried in this bill, that had brought the greatest prosperity to the industry in its history up to that time, those rates were repealed, and a rate of 10 per cent ad valorem was substituted. That 10 per cent ad valorem has rendered the country splendid service, not that it served as any protection, but it has enabled this committee to-day and this Congress to measure the danger lurking in this competition from Mexican ore. Under that law of 1913 this industry, vital to American prosperity, has passed into foreign hands. Zinc ore, as you understand, is a product necessary in the manufacture of hundreds of articles of household necessity and absolutely essential in the manufacture of munitions of war. From the day it was known that the protection carried by the Payne-Aldrich bill on this industry was to be removed, and the ad valorem duty of 10 per cent substituted, until the opening of the war and for six months thereafter, the industry languished along with the other industries of the country.

During a considerable part of the time the Payne-Aldrich law was in force the Mexican rebellion, with its accompanying disorders, was going on. It supplemented the protection afforded by the Payne-Aldrich law. That protection afforded by the rebellion still exists, but I want to call your attention to the industry and to the causes for its decline given by the laboring men and by the men who have their money in this industry. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] complained the other day because, as he said and labored to show, under the tungsten bill $5,000,000 would be taken from the pockets of the people and given to some American importers who lived over in New York. It was shown to the House that such statement was not correct and by the terms of that bill could not be true. But if it were true, as Mr. KITCHIN contended, if $5,000,000 would have been given by the tungsten bill to the importers of tungsten in New York, that conduct would not measure with the conduct of the men who took the protection off this industry. During 1916, 155,000 tons of zinc ore were imported into the United States from Mexico alone, and nearly 800,000 tons came into the United States from the various countries that imported zinc ore into our country during the years 1915, 1916, and 1917—750,000 tons that the American producer under the conditions prevailing would have received $67.50 a ton for, amounting to about $35,000,000, and that amount was voted by the gentleman from North Carolina and his party associates in this House not to American citizens in New York, who would pay taxes on it or build houses, but it was handed over into the pockets of Mexicans and into the pockets of Japanese and Chinese and other foreigners.

Mr. KITCHIN and his party, without batting an eye, voted to take the protection from zinc ore, and as the result of that vote 750,000 tons of ore came in during 1915, 1916, and 1917, for which the American producer would have received more than $30,000,000.

Let these men who own the mills and mines and have worked in them tell you the splendid services that were rendered to them by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and his party in 1913 acting upon the proposition and the supposition that it would violate the Constitution of the United States to protect the American workingman or an American citizen who had his capital invested in industry in his own country. The situation in the Joplin district is desperate, especially in Missouri. The situation is reflected in the falling off of production from 287,925 tons of zinc-ore concentrates in 1916 to 88,627 tons in 1918. In April, 1918, the mine operators and citizens made a special appeal to Congress, setting up the following facts:

To the business men, miners, and property owners of the Webb City-Carterville mining district:

Why conceal the facts? A great misfortune, amounting to disaster, has overtaken the Webb City-Carterville mining district. It is time the entire citizenship was aroused to the situation. The business man, the merchant, the miner, and the property owner are equally concerned.

The Southwest Missouri Mine Safety and Sanitation Association has recently gathered information and facts that every man should know. It is time that we were awakened to the situation. Out of the 87 mills that were in operation in the Webb City-Carterville district, including Oronogo, Prosperity, and Duenweg, only 18 are now in operation, or partial operation, with the probability that 5 more of them will be closed within the next week. Of these 69 mills, 30 of them have been dismantled and moved away, and others are now being offered for sale.

The production of zinc ore has declined from 75,000,000 pounds for the first 11 weeks in 1916 to 25,000,000 pounds for a like period in 1918; from 58,000,000 pounds in November and December, 1916, to 24,000,00 pounds in November and December, 1917. The bank deposits in Webb City alone have fallen off more than $500,000.

Some of the business houses have been closed and the business men of the district are making no money. The situation will become worse, because many of the miners working in the Oklahoma field are now still living in Webb City because of cheaper rents.

That every citizen may have the information, a list has been prepared showing the names of the mills that were in operation 12 months ago which have now either been closed down or dismantled and moved away.

And there follows then a list of these 87 mills, all closed down by the gentleman from North Carolina and his party. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], calling attention to what he considers the basic difference between his side of the House and ours, said that when they undertake to levy a tariff they consult the consumer and make things cheap for him; that they pay no attention to the producer. They can not help him, however much they would like to do so, on account of their claim that the Constitution prevents giving him relief. He says we on this side find the differences in production cost and try to make a rate of duty that represents the differences, and that we always give the producer the benefit of the doubt.

The gentleman claims the differences are in the rates merely. But I say to you the difference between this side of the House and that is far deeper than a question of rates. I have shown that you declared at Baltimore in 1912 that every time Congress invoked the principle of protection it violated the fundamental law. Every man on the Democratic side of the House, when a proposition arises in this body like that we are considering, is restrained by scruples—he can not violate the Constitution that he has sworn to support, and thinks he would do so to protect labor and capital by tariff duties.

To us your doctrine is revolting. We believe to maintain the standards of wages and of living of our workingmen is one of the principal objects for which our Government was organized and for which it exists.

It would have been a poor consolation to support and sustain our soldiers while undergoing the hardships and hazards of war to have reflected on your tariff principles and to have read your platform declaration. If a soldier came from the zinc-mining area he would have known that if while he was fighting for you and me some Mexican had taken his job by supplying the demand for zinc ore in the United States he could not trust you to give him an opportunity. You had served notice of the scruples that restrained you. They were constitutional with you.

But the Republican doctrine is the very contrary. We say we have the power under the Constitution to make it possible for the American producer to deal in his own market, and that power is one we delight to exercise.

The difference between us is not as to rates merely. It goes far deeper than that. Let us see what occurred when the war came on. When this war opened in 1914 one-half of the entire smelting capacity of the world was in Germany and Belgium. Within a few weeks after that war commenced, after the invasion of Belgium, Germany had control of 50 per cent of all the smelter capacity of the world. There was an immense demand for zinc. That demand had to be supplied by the smelters of this country. Notwithstanding the great scarcity of ships, as I have said the hearings in this case show that in 1915, 1916, and 1917 nearly 800,000 tons of zinc ore came in. What is the situation? We reproduced before the committee a showing that was made in 1913 to the Ways and Means Committee that enacted the Underwood tariff law. We took the statement from the books of six mining companies operating in Mexico showing the wages paid the ground boss, the shift boss, the pump man, the drill man, drill helpers, and shovelers, and the name of the mine was given and the cost in the hearing shown. Then we took six mines in our country that showed the same situation. That showed what men working in these different capacities mentioned in American mines received and what they received in the mines of Mexico. In every instance our wages are from three to five times those paid in Mexico. The cost of manufacturing a ton in the Joplin district, from which we took the six mines, averaged $38.45. The average price in Mexico at that time was $13.97 per ton.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not just at this time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is not the gentleman willing to give us any information about his bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at this time; I will later.

Mr. ANDERSON. Very well.

Mr. McPHERSON. Since the passage of the Underwood Act the amount of ore coming in, the value of the ore, and the country from which it is imported is given. What do you suppose it was? Thirteen dollars a ton in 1913.

The average cost of production in Mexico, as shown by our Treasury reports for the year 1919, commencing with January, was $9.42 per ton. It is shown by these figures that the cost of production in our country at this time is in the neighborhood of $60 to $65. What did we get for the Treasury when we struck down this industry in 1913 to save the Constitution? Ninety cents a ton. You did not get enough money into the Treasury in revenue to pay the ransom of our Army at the present rate under watchful waiting. Gentlemen on that side are anxious about the soldier. In 1918 these men of the volunteer Army, the National Guard, and the drafted army contributed their part. They had splendid jobs at splendid wages when they went across to fight for you and me, and when they came back those mines in Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and so forth, were closed down and the jobs of those soldiers are in the hands of Mexicans, Japanese, and Chinese. It is not a question of what will happen. That is the question you have created, and that exists to-day. But I want to say to you on that side that you may protest as loudly as you have done. Your solicitude and anxiety to do something for the soldier, every man of you, when you cast your vote against this bill will be judged insincere in that profession by the people of Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, and the other zinc-producing States where the soldiers have come back and found their jobs in the hands of Mexicans. You profess a particular interest in solving the problem of the high cost of living. I want to say to you that thousands of men who worked in this industry in 1918 and 1917, practically all of them, are without employment or have found it in other activities. They are suffering doubly on account of prices because they are unemployed. They are not earning and they have not the money to buy the wherewithal to support themselves and their families. They can not meet the cost of living if it is reduced. These young men have been abroad; they have seen the situation of the workingmen in Europe; they have seen the situation in France; they have seen them in England, as many of them have passed through that island. It is certain they are unwilling to live upon the same plane as workers over there. We are unwilling that you should compel him to do so, and we are therefore going to pass this bill. We see the situation, and not like you no construction of the Constitution to which we subscribe forbids our remedying it. We propose to put a duty on all the zinc ore that shall hereafter be imported so as to help solve the problem of the high cost of living of those in the zinc-mining industry by levying the rates carried by the Payne-Aldrich tariff law.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for information?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Would this bill have anything to do with foreigners——

Mr. McPHERSON. I can not hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does this bill have anything to do with foreigners working in this country?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is better than that. If there were 13,000 Mexicans, as there were 13,000 Americans, working in my district in the zinc-ore industry who proposed to come over into your district in Texas and take the jobs of 13,000 Texans, there would be a revolution. Yet that is what occurred in my district.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. But the gentleman does not answer my question.

Mr. McPHERSON. The jobs of those 13,000 American citizens are to-day in the hands of Mexicans, and yet the Mexicans are down in Mexico.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman please answer my question—whether this bill has anything to do with expelling Mexicans or foreigners from this country?

Mr. McPHERSON. It has to do with the expelling of Mexicans, Chinese, and Japanese in this way: They are potentially there. Their products are coming in, and when you buy this zinc ore, as you are buying it, you are employing Chinese, Japanese, or Mexicans. I am in favor of expelling that job from him——

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say——

Mr. McPHERSON. It is better that we should have the Mexican himself here than to have his products, because our merchants could sell him goods, and we could tax him for schools and to run the Government, but he takes a job in this country by sending his products here, and our money goes down there as wages, and it would be better that he was himself here.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say that the passage of this bill will put one Mexican out of the Joplin mines?

Mr. McPHERSON. It may not put a Mexican out of Joplin, but it will put him out of a job working for Joplin. It will put all of them out of the Joplin district. It will raise the wages of the Joplin miner to the rate he was receiving, which, as it is shown, rivals that of circuit judges down in the State of Texas. [Laughter.]

Who wants this bill? I will show you. I have shown you what these mine owners, who in my district alone have an investment of $50,000,000, say they wanted. Now, let us see. Are they the only ones? Down there these American citizens, since they have come back from war and find the situation I have described, have organized themselves. They call themselves the "Workingmen's Protective Tariff League."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not yield 10 minutes.

Mr. McPHERSON. Give me five minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will give you all the time I have—five minutes.

Mr. McPHERSON. That will be plenty.

They passed the following resolution:

RESOLUTION FAVORING THE PASSAGE OF THE ZINC-ORE TARIFF BILL.

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the members of the Workingmen's Protective Tariff League that Congressman I. V. McPHERSON, of the fifteenth congressional district of Missouri, has introduced the following bill into Congress at Washington, D. C., to wit:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the metallic contents of all zinc ore imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions, a tariff of 2 cents per pound."

Resolved by the Workingmen's Protective Tariff League, with headquarters at Joplin, Mo., in meeting assembled, That we express our emphatic approval and indorsement of the said zinc-ore tariff bill, and instruct the officers of this league to convey to Mr. McPHERSON our hearty congratulations on his having introduced said measure, and assure him that the working people of this district do approve of his wise action in having introduced said bill, and pledge to him our support and assistance in having the bill enacted into law.

Unanimously adopted May 30, 1919.

WORKINGMEN'S PROTECTIVE TARIFF LEAGUE.

Why, it is because the men who sat in this House from that district subscribed to this infamous proposition, that it violates the Constitution of the United States to levy duties to protect workingmen, that I am here at all.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman why a higher rate of duty was imposed on a pound of high-grade ore than on low-grade ore.

Mr. McPHERSON. Because in extracting the low-grade ore a larger per cent of it is burned up. It was consumed in the process of smelting. They lose more of it. In other words, if there are 600 pounds of metal to the ton of ore, or 20 per cent, when you smelt it you will not get 600 pounds. You lose more on account of that low-grade ore.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, in order that a conference committee may be appointed, I ask that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 6238 had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2622, an act to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, insist that the House amendment be adhered to, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to take up the bill S. 2622, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, what is it?

Mr. KAHN. This is the officers' bill, providing for the 18,000 officers.

Mr. WINGO. What is the principal amendment of the Senate?

Mr. KAHN. The House struck out all of the Senate bill and wrote an amendment of its own.

Mr. WINGO. I recall. In other words, the difference between the two Houses is the difference between the House and the Senate bills?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. WINGO. And the gentleman asks to agree to the conference asked for by the Senate?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. WINGO. That puts the whole thing in conference, does it not?

Mr. KAHN. Quite right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. KAHN, Mr. GREENE of Vermont, and Mr. DENT.

ZINC ORE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, while we are in the House I ask that the time be divided, one hour and a half to be divided equally between the Democratic side of the House and this, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] control one half of the time and I control the balance of the 45 minutes on this side.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. Would that kind of an agreement be incidental to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no such motion before the House.

The SPEAKER. It was proper, however, to make that motion.

Mr. BLANTON. There was no such motion made.

Mr. WINGO. I submit that, while that may have been the practice, the gentleman can ask unanimous consent at any time.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary. It is only necessary to advise the House of what the purpose is. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent that the general debate on the bill which the House was considering in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be limited to one hour and a half, 45 minutes to be controlled by himself and 45 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

Mr. HASTINGS. Reserving the right to object, is the time already consumed by that side of the House to be taken out of this hour and a half?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Speaker did not put it correctly then.

The SPEAKER. The Chair took it that it was to be limited from now on to an hour and a half.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the Speaker will permit, that was the original understanding, but it was not submitted to the House that there would be an hour and a half to be divided equally between the two sides. We have already consumed 30 minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And that will be deducted?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to one hour from now, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] and the balance of the time by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6238.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 5.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY].

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6238. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will please take the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6238, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 6238, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6238) to provide a tariff and to obtain revenue in connection with the metal contents of zinc ores and products thereof and repealing existing laws fixing the rates of duty on such commodities.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2622) entitled "An act to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. WARREN, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. THOMAS as members on the part of the Senate of a joint committee to make arrangements for appropriate exercises in welcome of John J. Pershing, general and commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces of the World War, as provided for by House concurrent resolution 29.

DUTY ON ZINC ORE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. RODENBERG. Mr. Chairman, on August 1 the President addressed the following letter to the Speaker of the House:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 1 August, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The Director General of Railroads informs me that the situation with reference to the railroads is growing so critical every hour that I hope it will be possible for the House to postpone its recess until some definite action is taken upon the recommendations contained in my letter to Mr. ESCH. Officials of the Government have been in consultation with reference to the problems growing out of the high cost of living, upon which I expect recommendations to be made within a fortnight. I sincerely trust that the proposed recess of Congress may be postponed at least until such time as we may know definitely the problems which confront us, growing out of this intricate situation.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker, House of Representatives.

In compliance with the suggestion of the President, the House, by a vote that was practically unanimous, rescinded the resolution providing for a recess. While many of us then believed and still believe that this was simply an adroit move on the part of the Executive to shift responsibility to the legislative branch of the Government and to shield the hopeless incompetency of the Department of Justice in the matter of enforcing the laws now on the statute books against food profiteering, yet we complied with the President's wishes, so that no partisan of his might be able to say that he failed to secure the full and hearty cooperation of Congress in his long-deferred effort to do something to bring about a reduction of the high cost of living.

The situation, gentlemen, has not changed since that letter was written. Conditions are even more critical to-day than they were on the 1st day of August. Thousands of railroad shopmen are out of employment, have quit their jobs, and there is a general feeling of unrest permeating every branch of that important service. And added to this there looms up to-day on the horizon the possibility of a great strike in the steel mills of the country, an industry that forms the very backbone of our industrial life; and in the meantime, while there is chaos and confusion in the industrial world, the cost of living continues to soar, and there is no prospect of relief in sight, so far as any consumer can see.

And now, in the face of this critical, this serious, and "may I not" say this desperate situation, the President to-morrow intends to start out on a political tour, and the expenses of that tour are to be paid out of the Federal Treasury at a time when he admonishes us to practice the most rigid economy in all governmental matters.

Why, my friends, now, after being gone the greater part of the year, he intends to absent himself for another month from the Nation's Capital, the seat of government, where his duties and responsibilities are centered.

In his address to the laboring people yesterday he emphasizes the great necessity for teamwork. Great God! How can you have teamwork when the lead horse refuses to allow himself to be harnessed and goes gallivanting all over the world? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, gentlemen, in the hope—vain though it be—of directing the attention of the President, whose migratory habits are proving not only an embarrassment but a positive injury to the best interests of the Nation, to the serious mistake that he is making, I introduced a resolution on August 29 for the consideration of the House. The resolution is couched in very respectful language, and I know that you will agree that the diction, in part at least, is perfect, because I have employed the language of the Executive himself. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The resolution is as follows:

House joint resolution 185.

Suggesting the continued presence of the President of the United States at the Capital during the present crisis.

Whereas the situation with reference to the railroads and labor, generally, is of such pressing importance as to indicate the necessity for immediate steps to bring capital and labor together for a better understanding; and

Whereas in compliance with the recent request of the President of the United States Congress will shortly have adopted legislation giving the administration the same control over wearing apparel and other necessaries of life that it has had for more than a year over the hoarding of and profiteering in food products; and

Whereas the renewed absence of the President, at a time when his signature is required to place into effect the measures adopted by Congress to reduce the high cost of living, would occasion serious delay in solving this vital problem: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States should postpone his proposed tour of the country at least until such a time as we may know definitely the problems which confront us growing out of this intricate situation.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

I sincerely hope that before the day passes this resolution may be adopted by the House. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back the balance of his time—three minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] for 45 minutes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Chair to notify me when I have spoken 25 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, chaos does prevail in this country. In a period when the highest wages are being paid in our industries chaos prevails in our industries.

Why are strikes threatened? Why is this labor unrest? The answer is plain. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG], who just finished his speech, did not read the last edition of the afternoon papers. Labor proposes six strikeless months. Why? In order to enable this Congress and the administration, if possible, to reduce the cost of living.

Now, what are you doing to reduce the cost of living? I want to call attention to the fact that the bills so far reported out by the Committee on Ways and Means fall under four heads—clothing, homes and home buildings, education, and food. You have reported out a bill to increase the cost of dyestuffs, a bill to increase the cost of buttons. That latter bill you have just passed through this House in order, you say, that higher wages may be paid, when the highest wages ever paid in these industries in the history of the world are now being paid. And you have reported a bill to increase the cost of tungsten, to increase the cost of magnesite, and you have reported this bill to increase the cost of zinc. In other words, in this country to-day the great building industry in this age of iron and steel lies prostrate, and you propose by these bills to increase the cost of these important raw materials in this industry.

Wages! A steel strike! Why, during the last two or three years men who have been working in the steel industries have been receiving in wages, many of them, as much as $1,000 a month. Why are they striking? Because profiteers are at large in the land, and you propose by these bills to create more profiteers. And I make no distinction between a tariff profiteer in this crisis in the history of this Nation and any other kind of a profiteer. Third, you have on the calendar—in fact, you have already passed through the House—a bill increasing the taxes on chemical glassware. Heretofore the colleges of the country, which consume half the supply of chemical glassware entering the country or manufactured in the country, enjoyed free chemical glassware—that is, if it was intended for use in a college, it could come in free of duty. In the bill you passed through the House you removed this free importation provision and taxed it all, and increased the taxes. It was the practice in colleges to compel students of chemistry to pay for the chemical glassware they used, and college authorities in hearings we have had say that they propose to continue this practice. It will amount to $15 or $20 per student per year, and so you propose by this bill to increase the cost of obtaining an education. Fourth and last, you have here on the calendar of the House a bill to increase the cost of potato flour. Bread is made now out of potato flour. Five per cent of the ingredients that go into a loaf of bread can be potato flour, and it is a bread improver. It will make cheaper bread and it will make better bread. But you propose to increase the price of potato flour.

And then this committee spent days and almost weeks considering a bill to increase the price of the farmers' fertilizers throughout this country. You have not had courage enough yet to report it out.

In other words, these bills that are now on the calendar, to which I have called attention, upon the theory that you are going to increase wages—and the laborers are not demanding that—increase first the cost of clothing in your duties on dyestuffs and buttons; second, the cost of building homes and buildings, in your duties upon tungsten, magnesite, and zinc; third, the cost of obtaining an education, by increasing the tax on chemical glassware and passing it on to the students; and, fourth, the cost of bread. That is the Republican way of meeting the crisis in this country.

The President starts on his western journey soon in order to explain to the people of this country the theory and the doctrine of peace throughout the world as made possible by the pending treaties. This is the period of reconstruction following the war; and you propose to keep the war alive by keeping this peace treaty pending indefinitely in the Senate of the United States. God speed the President in his mission [applause]; and if he accomplishes what he starts out to accomplish, then you will commence to see production increasing throughout the land and the price of the necessities of life falling.

I want to say to you that you are not going to get through the Senate any of these three tariff bills on tungsten, magnesite, or zinc. You will not even get them out of the Finance Committee of the Senate. These are raw materials for the Steel Trust, and the Steel Trust is an octopus that you dare not offend. Now, see if I am not right about it. See if any one of these three bills that you are spending so much time on, when you ought to be discussing some of these real problems, is ever reported out by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Not one of them will ever be reported out by that committee, because this great octopus, which reaches down into the very vitals of the Republican Party and controls it, does not want them reported.

Zinc is used for the purpose of manufacturing brass, galvanizing iron, making structural sheet zinc, and for the purpose of desilverizing lead bullion.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. HERSEY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Steel Trust controls the Senate of the United States?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; but the Steel Trust controls the Republican Party, and, unfortunately for the welfare of this country and the peace of the world, the Republican Party controls the Senate and all its committees. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No; I can not yield; I do not have much time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Just for a question.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I can not yield.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield further to me?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. No. Later on, if I have time, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HERSEY. I wanted an explanation; that is all.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The history of the zinc industry in this country can be told in a few words. It is not an infant industry by any means. We have been producing zinc for over a hundred years. They have been producing it in the Joplin field down there, about which we hear so much, for 60 years. We have been exporting zinc for a hundred years from the Franklin furnaces, right over here in the State of New Jersey. It is not a difficult business. It is not something that requires skilled operators. It is an easy mining proposition. In order to mine zinc, you simply drill a hole in the ground and find where the deposit of zinc is, and it is never any deeper than 250 feet, and usually about 100 feet, and even less than that. Then, when you find it you dig a shaft and take it out with a windlass. It is a business for small capitalists. A man with $150 or $200 can start a zinc mine and drill his holes and then finance his proposition. There is not a zinc-mining industry in this country that cost half a million dollars, and only two or three of them that cost over $100,000. It is not a well-defined industry. I have been trying to find out how many men are employed in the zinc industry, but I can not ascertain the number. There are no statistics on that subject. When the census reports were being made up no man said, "I am a zinc miner," because they are not. They work in the zinc mines when it does not pay to work anywhere else, and they work in the zinc mines when the price of the product is high and when the wages that are paid are high.

When the product declines to anything like the world price in ordinary times, why, all these little miners go out of business and go back to work in the stores or on the farms whence they came. The business of smelting zinc ore is a well-defined business in this country, which before the war employed over 9,000 men and paid over $6,000,000 in wages. I do not know how many it employed during the war, but at the beginning of the war there were 29 factories and at the close of the war there were 49 factories, and the output of refined zinc has probably doubled in amount. Now, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. McPHERSON], who has discussed this subject, has called attention to the production of zinc as shown by the commerce reports, and he says that the importations of zinc in 1915 amounted to 79,000 tons, and in 1916 to 291,000 tons, and in 1917 to 262,000 tons. But why did he not give the importations of zinc in 1918? I will tell you why he does not give it, and they do not attempt to give it here in the report either, because the importations of zinc in 1918 were only 102,234 long tons. In other words, these importations that they fear so much in 1919 had fallen off in 1918, the last year of the war, to one-half what they were the year before, and so gentlemen do not refer to the 1918 figures but refer simply to the large figures of 1916 and 1917. And they do not refer to the fact that although the importations in 1918 were only 102,000 long tons, nearly all of this amount was merely smelted here, and the refined product was reexported—brought in in bond, as all the zinc ore is brought in, and smelted, and the refined product was shipped abroad and the drawbacks paid; and in 1918, the year when the importations were only 102,000 tons, the drawbacks were the greatest in the history of the industry. The importations in 1918 which came in competition with the domestic industry were negligible. They produce zinc in 23 States in the Union. I presume if they put enough money into the cost of production they could produce it in nearly every State in the Union. They produce zinc in most of the countries of the world.

Now, I want to ask some gentleman on the Ways and Means Committee, or the gentleman from Missouri who has just taken his seat [Mr. McPHERSON], to tell me what evidence there is anywhere in this record as to the cost per unit of producing a ton of zinc at the present time in Mexico.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Did not the hearings before the committee show that under the Underwood tariff bill the average rate upon which the duty of 10 per cent was paid in the months of January, February, and March average $9.42 a ton?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I am asking what the unit cost for producing a ton of zinc is in Mexico at the present time.

Mr. McPHERSON. Not at this present day, but it was shown that the average was $9.42 in the months that I have mentioned.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The only evidence produced is a table showing the cost of ore production in Mexico mined December, 1908, before the disturbances in Mexico started. Since that time Mexico has been undergoing internal wars and revolutions, and is in about as bad a fix industrially as Russia, perhaps worse. There is no evidence anywhere in this record showing how much a cigarette-smoking, lazy, siesta-enjoying Mexican peon can produce, nor what the cost of production of a ton of ore is in Mexico.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. McPHERSON. Was it not shown in the hearings in support of the cost of production——

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. We have that on page 27 of the hearings.

Mr. McPHERSON. Page 12; it shows that the average was $9.42 a ton.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. That is not the question I asked. You are talking about the price of the ore at the present time, when there has been such an overproduction here and everywhere that values are completely destroyed. Of course, we can produce zinc in Rhode Island, in all probability, but perhaps at a cost of $100 or $200 a ton. According to the authorities submitted by the proponents of this bill, it cost $16 a ton to produce zinc in the Miami section of the Joplin district.

According to Weed, who is the mining authority on this matter, according to his publication, the cost of producing zinc ore in 1917 was approximately $42 a ton in Joplin and $16 a ton in Miami; and you are asked in this bill for a tariff of $20 per ton. In other words, in order to equalize the cost of producing zinc ore, in order to make up the difference between the labor cost in Mexico and the labor cost here, you are imposing a duty higher per ton than the entire cost of producing this ore in the Miami district, where it can be produced cheaper than in the Joplin section; and if you place the duty high enough you can probably make it profitable to produce it in Rhode Island or New York.

Now, I want to call attention to the hearings for the purpose of showing how the Republican members of this committee reason things out when they draw a tariff bill. They have not taken any chances on this bill, for they have simply readopted the old Payne-Aldrich rate all the way through. They had no tariff on zinc ore from 1861 to 1909. In 1792 the tariff act of that year put zinc on the free list, and it remained on the free list until 1846, when, through some mistake in the preparation of the tariff bill of that year, it was not mentioned, and therefore went in the "not otherwise specially provided for" clause, which was 20 per cent.

They reduced it a few years later to 15 per cent, and in 1861 took it off altogether. There was no tariff in all the time that the discoveries were being made in the Joplin country of zinc ore. There was no tariff until in the campaign of 1908 Uncle JOE CANNON and some Republicans went down to that State and told them if they elected a Republican Congress, if they sent a Republican to Congress, they would get a tariff on zinc. I would like to know how much money that speech and similar speeches that year cost the home builders of this country.

Since that time, with the price of zinc going out of sight, the farmers have been covering their buildings not with galvanized iron but with paper and rubberoid roofing in order to keep out the rain from their stored-away crops and from their stock. They could not afford the zinc roof that is used in all other sections of the world.

Germany controlled half of the zinc supply of the world prior to the war. She controlled almost half, and when she succeeded in acquiring control of the Belgian mines and the Belgian smelters she did control half. But Germany, the highest tariff country in the world except the United States, never dreamed of the infamy of increasing the price of galvanized roofs by putting a tariff on zinc ore and on refined zinc.

Zinc ore and refined zinc have always been free in Germany, and with free ore Germany built up the greatest zinc-ore industry and the greatest zinc-smelting industry in the world. She invited importations, and inviting metal importations is always the wise thing for an industrial nation to do. From far-away Australia all of the zinc ore was sent to Germany, and it was smelted there. Since the war German mines and German smelters are located, nearly all of them, in the new State of Poland, and Belgium has acquired again control of her own mines and of her own smelters. Of what country in the world are you afraid at the present time? In the hearings it appears that you are afraid of Australia. Some one said that Australia had accumulated 350,000 tons of zinc ore and was ready to dump that ore on the markets of this country. That shows how much you do not know about the subject. England has contracted to take all the zinc-ore output of Australia for 10 years after the end of the war, and not a ton of it will come here. The conditions in Canada are much the same as they are here. The wages they pay there are about the same. Canada has just offered a bounty of 8 cents per pound upon electrolytic zinc, and you need not expect Canada to send anything down in the way of zinc ore for smelting purposes. Heretofore Canada has sent all of her zinc ore here, everything she produced, to be smelted here.

I want to call your attention to the theories upon which this committee has drawn this bill. Mr. Paul A. Ewart was a witness before the committee. As I read from his testimony you will see that he knew better, but that the Republican members of the committee who drew the bill did not know any better. They were discussing the method of levying the tariff on zinc, and Mr. MOORE said they simply took the foreign value for the purpose of fixing the duty. Mr. Ewart reluctantly agreed, and then Mr. FORDNEY, the chairman, said:

> The price of the ore on which the ad valorem duty is paid is fixed by the exporter, not by anybody in this country?

Mr. Ewart replied:

> It is fixed in this country under the Treasury's regulations.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. It is not fixed by anybody in this country, I beg your pardon; it is fixed by the exporter abroad, and the American consul certifies to that.

Then the chairman further says:

> It is not fixed at the port of entry in the United States. The value of an imported article which pays an ad valorem duty is fixed by the exporter abroad, and our American consul certifies to the manifest as to the value abroad.

Later Mr. MOORE said:

> If this foreign material came in at the American price; that is, if the duty was levied on the American price, you would not have so much of a quarrel with the law, would you?

All of these remarks being to this effect: Zinc ore is selling cheaper abroad than it is here. They have levied the duty on the foreign price; but if they did not do that, if they levied the duty on the Joplin price, on the East St. Louis price, according to Mr. MOORE and according to the chairman, this bill probably would never have been introduced. This testimony was taken just a little while ago, and they are complaining now of importations of 1916 and 1917. The importations in 1914 were negligible, and negligible also in 1915. I want to know if you gentlemen on the Republican side still think that the chairman and Mr. MOORE were right about it in the position they took. Nobody seems to know whether they were or not. I want to say to you that at that time and from the time these large importations commenced, from the 1st of July, 1916, until the present time, the duty on zinc ore has been levied upon the Joplin price—upon the price in this market.

You gentlemen who are responsible for these bills and who draw them do not know what the law is. Neither do you know what the circumstances are. Under paragraph L of section 3 of the tariff act of 1913—the Underwood law, the law which you are trying to amend by restoring the Payne rates—if it is impossible to ascertain the value of the imported product in the country of its origin, you take the domestic price. During the war and now zinc ore has not had a fixed value anywhere in the world, not even in this country, and on the 3d of June, 1916, when these tremendous importations came, which, according to Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. MOORE and the rest of them, could not have come if we had levied the tariff on the East St. Louis price, which is the market for Joplin here, our authorities at the ports were levying the tariff on the foreign ore at the domestic price. On the 3d of June, 1916, the Treasury Department made this order, and you will find it on page 25 of your own hearings:

> Method of ascertaining the value of zinc in imported ore under the provisions of paragraph L of section 3, tariff act of 1913, based upon the selling price of zinc in the United States.

Then follows the order, which you will find on the page of the hearings I have mentioned. From July 1, 1916, until the present time the tariff has been fixed on the domestic price and not on the foreign price. At the present time there is no market for zinc here or anywhere in the world. The demand for it in the manufacture of brass in the war just closed produced the present enormous surplus. When returning soldiers go back and look at the mines in Joplin they will find every mine mouth clogged with ore. That is the reason why zinc ore has no value here or anywhere in the world at the present time. You can not correct that situation by increasing the cost of roofing houses in this country and by increasing the cost of living. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The zinc ore situation in the country is this: The production of zinc ore was stimulated by the war to an unprecedented degree, not only in this country but throughout the world. It is true that the importations in 1916 did amount to over 290,000 tons, as shown by the Commerce Reports, but this importation fell off in 1918 to almost nothing. But the domestic production in 1916 was over 1,395,000 tons; in 1917 it was over 1,300,000; in 1918 it was over 1,000,000 tons. The figures used by the committee and by the gentlemen who discussed this question on the other side are the Commerce figures estimated by calendar years. The Treasury figures are more reliable and are found on page 17 of the report of the Tariff Commission on zinc ore. In 1918 there was only imported from Mexico and from all the world a little over 67,000 tons of zinc ore. Therefore for every ton of foreign ore from Mexico and from all the rest of the world brought into this country in 1918, 17 tons were produced and were consumed here. Under the stimulation of the war the production of zinc ore in this country was almost doubled, but the war ended with the armistice of last November, and the war ended with tremendously large stocks on hand at the smelters and at the mines, not only in this country but throughout the world, and the presentation of this bill at this time is an apparent attempt to keep up the war price of zinc. There is no market for zinc in this country except the market the smelters here create, and the market they create is the market made possible by the demand on them. At the present time they are carrying excess stocks and are not buying from the mines, and ore clogs the mouth of every mine. If the facts were known, it could probably be ascertained that speculators for small amounts of money are buying up the ore piled up at our mine openings waiting for this tariff bill, which restores the Payne rates, 300 per cent higher than the Underwood bill, to sell the ore at prices approximating the war prices of ore, and at one time the war price of this ore reached $137 per ton.

While we are bringing down in this country the price of everything else as much as we can, while we are emptying out our cold-storage warehouses and are throwing the Government stocks of food on the market in order to lower the cost of living, the proposition of the Republicans in this bill is to make it possible to unload at war prices the immense accumulation of zinc ore in this country.

It is the boast of one of the cities in the Joplin zinc district—Tulsa, Okla.—that they have more millionaires there than they have in any other city of its size in the world—oil millionaires, millionaires as the result of land speculations, and zinc millionaires. This thriving, prosperous city boasts that it has 1 millionaire for every 1,000 of its population. No other section of the country can equal this record, not even the Wall Street section of New York State. The Joplin mining district is about 300 miles long and 100 miles wide. Mining zinc there is an inexpensive proposition. It can be stimulated by high prices at any time, and in a few weeks its production can be doubled. The ore is brought to the surface by inexpensive methods, treated in "Joplin jigs"—cheap, crude, but effective machinery and made ready for the market in a comparatively short space of time. It is more valuable to this country to have these deposits there than it is to keep out of the country ore from Canada, Mexico, and other sections of the world and exhaust this domestic supply. If you succeed in getting this bill through, you may render tremendous assistance to the millionaires of Tulsa, and you may make it possible for men who operate zinc mines in this small section of the country to make money by maintaining war prices, but you will hinder the building industry of the country. You will make homes more expensive, and you will have contributed much toward keeping up the high cost of living.

The time has come in this crisis of our history to denounce the methods which make tariff profiteers. I can conceive of no character of profiteering at the present time which ought to be criticized more severely than the kind of profiteering the Republican Party is attempting to perpetuate by increasing 300 per cent the rates of the present tariff on zinc ore. The Joplin district has profited by the war. Those who have been engaged in the mining of zinc ore have profited beyond almost any of the dreams of avarice in which they ever indulged, but the time has come to stop it. We are trying to return to the normal period of prewar days. Under the present cheaper rates of the Underwood tariff bill more zinc ore has been mined in the Joplin district and in this country than was ever imported into the country for domestic consumption in the last 20 years of time. Under the Underwood bill production in the country has doubled. Eleven countries in the world produced more zinc ore than Mexico produced in 1913, the prewar year. In 1913 Mexico produced only 1 per cent of the world's production of zinc ore. The figures upon which proponents of this 300 per cent increase in taxes rely do not bear out their assertion. Importations did not increase under the Underwood law, but production did increase, and the production of the years of the Payne-Aldrich bill is insignificant and negligible as compared with the production of zinc ores in this country under the Underwood bill. The situation is that prices of all things must fall if we are to avert the crisis which confronts us, and these gentlemen on the Republican side are doing everything they can to keep up the war prices on this important metal.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. Chairman, since the hellish Huns have been driven back across the Rhine and the armistice has been signed, since the armaments have been taken away from our erstwhile ruthless foe and peace is in sight, we once more welcome back into the Halls of Congress our good friend from Illinois [Mr. RODENBERG]. His now criticizing lips were then sealed in silence during the long momentous months that this Congress was engaged in raising an army and in equipping the men who fought our battle and in providing for the revenue and the funds incident thereto. During that time we were denied the benefit of his counsel and his advice.

Whence comes this sudden and tremendous oratory? Has it been acquired through use of the proverbial Demosthenes pebble, while tramping up and down the unattractive New England seashore, or is it born solely of political envy? Is this distinguished disciple of eloquence apprehensive that Illinois will furnish so great an audience to the President of the United States there will be none left to hear his utterances? If only the gentleman had fought the Hun half as hard as he is now fighting the President of the United States the armistice might have been signed on the 10th rather than the 11th day of November last.

But "with all his faults we love him still," this genial gentleman from Illinois. When a youth he was taught to always aim high, and he is now shooting his darts at the biggest target in this Nation. But I must leave this interesting subject to perform another duty.

Why the new gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON] should have singled me out for attack I can not even conjecture. It is true that I did force him to attend prayers this morning, but how was I to know that he was not used to it? How was I to know that prayer affected him adversely? Our distinguished and beloved Chaplain has been praying to so many empty seats morning after morning since our Republican colleagues came into power and since our Democratic Members have learned that no doctrine of peace and good will could longer be prayed in their behalf that I felt constrained to force him an audience, little dreaming, however, that thereby I would incur the displeasure of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON].

Mr. Chairman, the mistakes and shortcomings of a new Member are usually overlooked, and in this instance, ordinarily, I would let the remarks pass unnoticed, as only a handful of Members heard the gentleman, and, unfortunately, very few read the RECORD; but he misquoted me on certain facts relating to the now almost forgotten pernicious plundering Plumb plan, concerning which the record must be kept straight. If in answering the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MCPHERSON] I were forced to take a text, it would be that good old Missouri slogan, "You have gotta quit kicking my dog around." The new gentleman from Missouri, in attempting to quote me, said that I had made speeches last week and at times previous wherein I had said that railroad firemen and railroad brakemen received salaries equal to that of a circuit judge in Texas. Then he attempts to pass upon the proper earning capacity of officers in Texas. I wanted to know something about the qualifications of a man who would voluntarily assume such a technical undertaking that had so many limitations to it, and upon consulting the Congressional Directory I find that the only public offices which this gentleman has held during his lifetime until he came to Congress were two, the first that of prosecuting attorney of Lawrence County, Mo.; and I am told that at that time the salary of prosecuting attorney there was about $1,500 a year. The other position which he held was a member of the Legislature of Missouri, and I am told that during that time and now a member of the legislature received only $5 a day for 70 days and the balance of his time he worked for a dollar a day. The man who earned, while an officer, that kind of a salary is assuming the responsibility of passing upon the earning capacity of circuit judges in the State of Texas. When a man who is used to earning about $1,500 a year in public office is suddenly put into a position paying $7,500 per annum he immediately imagines that every other $1,500 man in the United States should also get $7,500 per year. Since the gentleman has drawn in question my earning capacity, for his information I might tell him that in writing I have an offer of $800 per month for my services, which I declined.

I said nothing about brakemen or firemen; and if the gentleman does not change his remarks his notes will show that he quoted me as giving the salary drawn by brakemen and firemen on railroads, when the salaries given by me did not refer to either.

In placing in the RECORD figures from the general manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad and of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and of the United States Director General of Railroads, I referred to salaries only of passenger and freight conductors and engineers. Was there any occasion for the gentleman to misquote me? I put into the RECORD last Saturday a statement from the general manager of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad showing that the maximum paid to a passenger conductor on the Baltimore & Ohio last month amounted to $345.60. If that were the average salary per month during the year, it would constitute a remuneration of $4,147.20 a year.

Now, let us see what some governors get in some of the States. In Arizona, the governor gets $4,000; Delaware, $4,000; Nebraska, $2,500; New Hampshire, $3,000; Rhode Island, $3,000; South Carolina, $3,000; North Dakota, $3,000; Tennessee, $4,000; Texas, $4,000; Vermont, $3,000; Wyoming, $4,000.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. I will not be so discourteous as the gentleman was when he so recently refused to yield to me. I will be courteous to my colleague, and I yield.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I just want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Then do not take up all my time in preliminaries. Ask the question. I only had six minutes to begin with, and I had to fight for that, as I forced it from my colleague, while the gentleman who now wastes my time in asking me to yield spoke about 30 minutes, and yet declined to yield to me or to give me an opportunity to correct him when he misquoted me.

Mr. MCPHERSON. As I understand the gentleman complains because the workmen in this industry under Republican protection got a better salary than circuit judges in some backwoods communities such as South Carolina and——

Mr. BLANTON. No; the gentleman loses sight of the fact that all these bills brought in here—your Republican chemical glass bill, your Republican surgical-instrument bill, your Republican tungsten-ore bill, and this Republican bill which has just been passed, the pearl-button bill, which takes $5,000,000 from the pockets of the poor people and puts it into the pockets of rich manufacturers, and now this zinc-ore bill—all of them hurt the poor people of the country whom I represent on this floor of Congress, and the gentleman unfortunately represents millionaire manufacturers.

Oh, the gentleman now seems very solicitous about the returned soldier. What is your party doing for them? Day after day I have been urging on the floor of this House the consideration of some proper measure to do justice to our returned soldiers, and yet the Republican steering committee has sidetracked all bills proposing to do anything for soldiers, and is wasting the time of Congress on this class legislation making richer the now existing multimillionaires.

Why does not the Republican majority on the Rules Committee bring in a rule here making it in order to consider and pass some proper measure in behalf of the returned soldiers?

Even after Congress had passed the bill conferring the rank of general on Gen. Pershing for life, when I made a motion to then adjourn in honor of our private soldiers, sailors, and marines who did the actual fighting that made the winning of our war possible, not a single Republican was willing to vote to do them this honor, and my motion was voted down to take up another special-privileged bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I am certainly sorry, as I had much more to say to my young colleague from Missouri.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you want to consume any more time on that side?

The CHAIRMAN. The time on that side has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will occupy but very few minutes.

I have preached republicanism now for a long time. I am mighty glad to see one Democratic convert from Oklahoma. I believe if we had a zinc mine in every Democratic district of the South we would get a solid vote. [Applause on the Republican side.] We received a few votes from Colorado the other day on tungsten. We are going to take up a bill pretty soon dealing with citrus fruits, and then look out for southern California and Florida. I am glad to see them come. We welcome them all. We do not want to leave anybody out. We are going to take them all in this year and in 1920 make it unanimous.

Mr. MADDEN. But you get them in relays; you should get them all at once.

Mr. FORDNEY. We can not get them all at once; they are a shy lot of fellows, you know.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the statistics furnished to the Committee on Ways and Means by gentlemen who appeared before that committee, as shown in the hearings on pages 29 and 30, show that 82 per cent of 87 mines in the Joplin district are closed. That is a rather serious situation. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said a little while ago, when we were considering the pearl-button industry, that inasmuch as the Republican Party had been elected and was in power, the pearl-button manufacturers of the country were piling up stock in the storehouses. There is good evidence that that statement is correct, because they have confidence in the Republican Party to pull them out of the hole. That is quite a compliment to the Republican Party. The zinc industry in Missouri in 1909 when the Payne tariff law was framed was in bad shape, in just the same condition it is in now, because there was no duty in the Dingley tariff law on zinc ore. Between the time of the enactment of that law and the time the Payne tariff bill was framed the zinc-ore industry sprang up in Mexico. Mexican ore came into the country in such great volume that the zinc mines of the Joplin district especially and of the Southwest were closed. That is the situation to-day, due to the low rate of duty in the Underwood tariff law, of 10 per cent ad valorem.

The information presented to the committee is that Mexican ore recently has been and is being imported into this country at $9.20 a ton—a low grade ore, a 30 per cent ore. The ore produced in the Joplin district is 60 per cent ore. Therefore, one ton of Joplin ore contains as much metallic content as two tons of Mexican ore. But, in my candid opinion, because of the fact that that imported ore paid an ad valorem duty—and you must remember that the lower the import value under an ad valorem tariff provision the lower the duty—$9.20 a ton is not the actual value paid by the importers of Mexican ore into this country. The price has been kept down in order to keep down the amount of duty to be paid.

Let me give you an illustration of what the ad valorem duty has been doing. In the early stages of this war I discovered from the reports issued by the Department of Commerce that horses were being imported into this country from Canada; the finest horses in the world, the highest-grade horses in the world, were being imported at $27 a head, and we were exporting them to France at $225 a head. The price of the imported horse was cut down to $27 for the reason that the duty was an ad valorem duty, and the duty paid on that horse was $2.70, whereas if its actual value had been given in the certificate presented by the importer the duty would have been $20 or more per head.

Gentlemen, an ad valorem duty offers opportunity for fraud to every importer from every country in the world. We of the Republican Party believe in specific duties. When we have the power we enact into law specific rates of duty to prevent that kind of fraud. Our Democratic friends do not believe in the specific rate of duty. You are entitled to your opinion, gentlemen, but I think you are in error. I think you are wrong. So long as you do not agree with the Republicans fully I think you are wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, if there is no other debate asked for on that side of the House, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6238) to provide a tariff and to obtain revenue in connection with the metal contents of zinc ores and products thereof and repealing existing laws fixing the rates of duty on such commodities.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, in reading the bill, so that the Members may hear it, I ask that a quorum be here. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas make the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-nine gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that that committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. FORDNEY and Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 10, noes 95.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the metallic contents of all zinc ores imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions, the following sums, to wit: Upon all zinc-bearing ores, containing more than 10 per cent and less than 25 per cent of metallic zinc, 1¼ cents per pound on the metallic zinc contained therein; on all zinc-bearing ores containing more than 25 per cent of metallic zinc, 2 cents per pound on the metallic zinc contained therein. No duty shall be levied, collected, or paid on the zinc metallic contents of ores containing less than 10 per cent of metallic zinc: Provided, That on all importations of zinc-bearing ores made dutiable hereunder the duty thereon shall be estimated at the port of entry and a bond shall be given in a sum double the amount of such estimated duties for the transportation of the ores by common carrier bonded for the transportation of appraised or unappraised merchandise to properly equipped sampling or smelting establishments, whether designated as bonded warehouses or otherwise. On the arrival of the ores at such establishments they shall be sampled according to commercial methods under the supervision of Government officers, who shall be stationed at such establishments, and who shall submit the samples thus obtained to a Government assayer, designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall make a proper assay of the sample and report the result to the proper customs officers, and the import duties as provided by this act shall be liquidated thereon.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all necessary regulations to enforce the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on zinc in blocks or pigs and zinc dust, 1½ cents per pound; in sheets, 1¾ cents per pound; in sheets coated or plated with nickel or other metal or solutions, 2 cents per pound; old and worn out, fit only to be remanufactured, 1 cent per pound.

With committee amendments, as follows:

That on and after the day following the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon articles named herein, when imported from any foreign country into the United States or any of its possessions (except the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, and the islands of Guam and Tutuila), the rates of duties herein prescribed, namely:

SEC. 1. Zinc-bearing ore of all kinds, including calamine, containing less than 10 per cent of zinc, shall be admitted free of duty; containing 10 per cent or more of zinc and less than 20 per cent, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound on the zinc contained therein; containing 20 per cent or more of zinc and less than 25 per cent, one-half of 1 cent per pound on the zinc contained therein; containing 25 per cent of zinc or more, 1 cent per pound on the zinc contained therein: Provided, That on all importations of zinc-bearing ores the duties shall be estimated at the port of entry, and a bond given in double the amount of such estimated duties for the transportation of the ores by common carriers bonded for the transportation of appraised or unappraised merchandise to properly equipped sampling or smelting establishments, whether designated as bonded warehouses or otherwise. On the arrival of the ores at such establishments they shall be sampled according to commercial methods under the supervision of Government officers, who shall be stationed at such establishments, and who shall submit the samples thus obtained to a Government assayer, designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall make a proper assay of the sample, and report the result to the proper customs officers, and the import entries shall be liquidated thereon, except in case of ores that shall be removed to a bonded warehouse to be refined for exportation as provided by law. And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make all necessary regulations to enforce the provisions of this paragraph.

SEC. 2. Zinc in blocks or pigs and zinc dust, 1½ cents per pound; in sheets, 1½ cents per pound; in sheets coated or plated with nickel or other metal or solutions, 1½ cents per pound; old and worn-out, fit only to be remanufactured, 1 cent per pound.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] desire recognition?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I have a preferential motion that I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire recognition?

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer an amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition to oppose the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Let us have a vote on this.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire recognition?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not desire recognition, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not carry. I have no fear that it will carry.

I was very much interested in the speech made by my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD]. It was a very able and an eloquent speech. My colleague is here for his first term, but he has made good and we are proud of him, and I especially approve of the position he took on this bill to place a protective tariff on zinc. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, then, I feel that notwithstanding the fact that my colleague from Oklahoma is here for his first term, his older Democratic colleagues from Oklahoma, older in service, would do well to take his advice and vote for this protective tariff and for all other bills of this kind presented by the majority side. [Applause on the Republican side.] I say that in absolute good faith. Why? Here is the reason: I have voted on two general tariff bills since I have been a Member of this House. One was the Payne-Aldrich bill and the other was the Underwood bill. I voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill, and neither here, in my district, in my State, nor elsewhere have I ever apologized for that vote. [Applause on the Republican side.] I voted against the Underwood bill, and neither here nor elsewhere have I ever apologized for voting against that measure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Oklahoma is still a young State, and yet a great State, and it has great possibilities in the future. We have not only our great agricultural interests but our splendid mineral interests and industrial possibilities. We are capable of becoming one of the greatest manufacturing States in this Union. Take cotton. We produce nearly a million bales of cotton every year. With the exception of Texas we are one of the great cotton-producing States of the Union. Practically none of the other Southern States outranks us in that.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I should like to say to the gentleman that my State of Georgia outranks Oklahoma in the production of cotton.

Mr. MORGAN. Georgia does, and I believe there are one or two others, but not many.

Mr. CRISP. The cotton crop of Georgia is from 1,800,000 bales to 2,500,000 bales, and Oklahoma raises about 1,000,000 bales.

Mr. MORGAN. I say Oklahoma raises about 1,000,000 bales. Oklahoma outranks quite a number of the Southern States in producing cotton. But here is the point. Oklahoma has only one small cotton mill. Our cotton is transported to other Southern States where they have cotton mills; it is transported to the New England States, to England and to Japan, and to almost everywhere to be manufactured. If Oklahoma had the cotton mills, we could manufacture our own cotton and add, perhaps, 25 per cent to the value of that cotton crop of our State, and our people would get the benefit of it. And so in every other line. The interests of Oklahoma demand that we shall greatly multiply and enlarge our manufacturing concerns. Our manufacturing interests can not be properly developed unless we give adequate protection to those interests which will enable them to be developed.

Now, I should like to see the entire delegation from Oklahoma rise above politics, and now and at all times in the future vote for those bills which will aid in developing the material wealth of Oklahoma, which will develop its mines, its farms, and factories; give our people the benefits of this development, make them a greater and richer people; make Oklahoma a greater State, and help make the United States a greater Nation among the Governments of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] to strike out the enacting clause.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 14, noes 69.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of no quorum present, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAER. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BLANTON. After the Chair has announced the vote which shows no quorum, and the point of order is made that there is no quorum present, it is too late to ask for tellers.

Mr. BAER. I make the point of order that there were a great many present who did not vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eight Members present, a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I notice that several of our latest Members from Texas and Oklahoma held up their hands in the gallery. I wish to ask whether or not they were entitled to be counted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that is not a parliamentary inquiry. A quorum is present. The motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is lost. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Insert as a new section the following:

"SEC. 2. Zinc in blocks or pigs and zinc dust, 1½ cents per pound; in sheets, 1½ cents per pound; in sheets coated or plated with nickel or other metal, or solutions, 1½ cents per pound; old and worn-out, fit only to be remanufactured, 1 cent per pound."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment inserting section 2.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 84, noes 1.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TILSON. My point of order is that the point of order of the gentleman from Texas is dilatory; that the Chair having ascertained a number of times by a count that there is a quorum present, and it having been developed by tellers that there is a quorum present, and it being patent to the Chair that a number of gentlemen, especially on the Democratic side, did not vote on the last motion, manifestly there is a quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Chairman. The Members do not stay here. They go out in the hall and up in the gallery and outside.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, if that is the case they are but following the illustrious example of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; it is the example of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Oh, no; I stay here, but the gentleman grabs his hat and goes out when he has made his point of no quorum. He should stay here and help make a quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that the point of the gentleman from Texas is dilatory. The point of order is well taken. A quorum is present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That all existing laws fixing the rates of duty on the commodities in this act mentioned are hereby repealed—

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all of lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 5, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That all provisions of any act or acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORDNEY. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6238) to provide a tariff and to obtain revenue in connection with the metal contents of zinc ores and products thereof and repealing existing laws fixing the rates of duty on such commodities, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Doorkeeper was directed to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify the absentees, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and twenty-seven Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FORDNEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

ALLOTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT FOR NATIONAL SECURITY DEFENSE.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes to make a statement in regard to a report that has just come in from the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes relative to a message from the President. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, on the 19th of May last the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] introduced a resolution which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That resolution required the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives with an itemized statement showing the expenditures of appropriations of the $100,000,000 authorized in the deficiency appropriation act of April 17, 1917, and the appropriation of $50,000,000 authorized in the sundry civil appropriation act approved July 1, 1918. The Committee on Appropriations sent a copy of this resolution to the White House and also a copy to the Secretary of the Treasury, together with a request that the information be furnished. A statement of the expenditures under these appropriations had been promised for some time, but inasmuch as it was not forthcoming, this morning the Committee on Appropriations reported out the resolution. This afternoon I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Tumulty, reading as follows:

MY DEAR MR. GOOD: Referring to our several telephone conversations, I am sending you herewith a statement showing the allotment authorized by the President up to and including August 5, 1919, from the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the national security and defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, as provided for in the sundry civil appropriation act of July 1, 1918.

Sincerely, yours,

J. T. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

Inclosed with the letter is a statement of the expenditures under the $50,000,000 appropriation act. There is no statement, however, with regard to the expenditures under the $100,000,000 appropriated under the deficiency act approved April 17, 1917. A partial report was made by the President and was submitted by Mr. Sherley during the consideration of one of the deficiency bills. It seems to me that this statement just received should be printed in the RECORD. Considerable inquiry has been made of the Committee on Appropriations with regard to this itemized statement, and I think it should be printed as a part of the regular proceedings of to-day, and not printed in the back of the RECORD under the continuation of remarks. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be inserted in the RECORD at this point in the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the report referred to may be printed as a part of his remarks in the RECORD at this point. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman referred to the report that was made by the President in reference to the fund of $100,000,000 that was submitted by Mr. Sherley.

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In order that the RECORD of to-day may show where that report may be found, I want to state that it is found on page 7906 of volume 56 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, second session.

Mr. GOOD. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I suggest to the gentleman, if he thinks it wise, that he may ask unanimous consent to include the report at this time, so that they both may appear together in the RECORD of to-day.

Mr. GOOD. I was going to say to the gentleman that I have no objection to that; but it seems to me that a further statement or report will be forthcoming, bringing that down to date, and that when that report comes, then we may have the prior report to which he refers printed as a supplement to that report.

Mr. GARNER. This does not take up very much space.

Mr. GOOD. I have no objection to it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this report does show the disposition of some $73,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the report referred to be printed in connection with the other. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The reports referred to are as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who spoke on the zinc bill and the pearl-button bill be permitted to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is suspension day, fixed by unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand, but the gentleman from Kansas will take only 15 minutes, and that can be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the minority report on H. J. Res. 151, having reference to additional compensation to postal employees.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has no right to offer that on the floor. He can put it in the basket the same as other reports. I obtained unanimous consent for the gentleman to file his report within five days, and he has that privilege. Now he comes on the floor, and I informed him he has no right——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. All right. I will file it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 7594) relating to the creation of the office of General of the Armies of the United States.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order, please. Judge Cohalan, we will hear you now. Unfortunately our time is limited, and we can give only two hours, as we have to hear representatives of Greece for an hour afterwards. Judge Cohalan, I leave it to you to arrange the time for the different speeches.

STATEMENT OF HON. DANIEL F. COHALAN, JUSTICE OF THE SUPREME COURT OF NEW YORK.

Judge COHALAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, acting on behalf of those who are here to represent the great bulk of the 20,000,000 of the Irish element in this country, we have arranged a program which with your permission we will carry through in the order we have fixed, if possible, taking only the time you have allotted to us. If we may have to call upon you for a few minutes extra, we are going to ask you to indulge us in it if you will.

We are opposed to the proposed league of nations for many reasons, all of which we believe are of great weight and importance to the interests of our country. We object, in the first place, to the proposal to establish what we believe to be a superstate to which shall be delegated or turned over powers that belong to the sovereign United States of America. We believe that that is an infringement upon the sovereignty of the country and is an interference with its liberty, and because of that we most strongly oppose the establishment of any such body.

We believe it to be an affront to America to suggest even that in any such proposed league of nations as is coming before us it should be proposed that any country, no matter how friendly it may claim to be to America, should have six votes as compared to the one vote of America. We believe that would be practically an affront to the interests of America and to the intelligence of the people of America and a very decided injury to America if any such scheme were to go through.

We are opposed to this proposed league of nations because of the fact that under it we believe the old American doctrine of the freedom of the seas, for which America has stood all through its history, is not taken care of in any way, but that, on the contrary, the matter has been arranged in such a way as practically to turn over to England, without protest, the control of the oceans of the world.

We call your attention to the fact that because of the extraordinary development of our industrial conditions we manufacture in less than 8 months of every year what we would consume in 12 months, and that as a consequence of that for 4 months in the year we are dependent for a market, for an output for our factories, upon our foreign trade. We insist that under the conditions that would obtain if this proposed league of nations were to go through we would be left in a position where we could carry on such trade, not as a matter of right which we now enjoy, for which we fought, and our forefathers before us fought, and which we have always enjoyed during the history of our country, but we would be put in a position where we would enjoy it as a privilege extended to us by the nation which controlled the sea. We say this in no spirit of hostility to England. We would take the same position if any other country were put in the position of controlling the sea. We insist that for the interest of America it is absolutely requisite that we should be put in a position where no power would be able to control the ocean through the system of navalism any more than we would have been taken care of if any country had been able to control all the land under the system of militarism.

We believe we went to war for the purpose of ending autocracy and all that that means, and that it means not alone militarism, the control of the land, but also navalism, the control of the oceans of the world. We say that if we were put in a position where we could carry on our commerce only so long as the opportunity to do so was extended to us as a matter of privilege by any nation, no matter how friendly that nation might claim to be, we could in no way build up our commerce or build up our industry on any permanent basis at all, because we would be left in the position where the carrying on of our commerce would be subject to the whim, or subject to the interest, or subject to the passion of the hour, as it might appeal to any other nation, or to any combination of nations together; and we point out with relation to that that we do not believe this war will have been properly won; that is, that the interests of America will have been properly taken care of as a consequence of the winning of the war as we insist that it was won, because of the contribution made by America, in spite of all that may be said by the other countries and the contributions they made, that it was because of the contribution made by America that the war ended in the way in which it did; and we say that under those circumstances the interests of America and the interests of mankind will not be properly safeguarded so long as any one nation or any combination of nations is left in possession and control of the sea, and able to interfere with the commerce that should be carried on in a normal way between all the free-trading countries of the world, all the countries that want to carry on commerce with one another and to have friendly business relations with one another.

We point out, with relation to that, that we believe the existence of the British fleet in its position of predominant power to-day is such that it can be directed only as against the commerce of the United States. We say that it no longer can be a weapon in the hands of England as against Germany, because Germany has been put in a position where it can in no way compete with England, where it has been deprived of its navy entirely.

We say the same thing with relation to Russia. We say that it can not be held in any way to be used as a weapon against France, because France, through the action of her statesmen and the stress of circumstances, has practically been taken into the continental vassalage of England. We say under those conditions that the English fleet can be directed or used as a weapon of menace against nobody except the United States of America, and we point out that even though, as many Englishmen contend, it is only a matter of coincidence that at any time when any country has put itself or been put in the position of being an economic rival or being an industrial competitor of England ruin has overtaken that country in every way; and we say in the interest of a just and permanent peace, if it can be made under these conditions at all, it can be made only by taking care to see that England should not be put in a position where she can menace the commerce of the United States, and menace the commerce of the world, whenever it suits her interest or whenever it suits her whim to do so. We suggest, with relation to that, that in any peace that should be made precaution should be taken to see that there be a general disarmament not only on land but also on sea, so that there will be actual freedom of all the world and not freedom simply of part of the world.

We point out the importance of Ireland in any scheme that would practically bring about the freedom of the sea. We say, again in no spirit of hostility to England at all, but only taking conditions into account as they exist, that England can not continue to be the dominant power of the earth, that England can not continue to control the world, unless she controls the sea, and that her continued control of the sea is dependent upon her continued control of Ireland; and we say that she can make no better contribution to the general freedom of the world, she can give no better evidence of her desire to make a just and durable and permanent peace, in any way equal to that which she would make by consenting to the disarmament of this fleet, which now is so very much larger than the fleet of any other nation or practically any combination of nations.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do you object to being asked a question, or do you want to proceed without interruption?

Judge COHALAN. I do not mind, at all.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I wanted, if it would not interrupt the continuity of your thought, to have you state a little more in detail what you mean when you say that the continued supremacy of the sea depends upon this control of Ireland by England. I did not quite get it.

Judge COHALAN. For your consideration I would present the geographical position of Ireland with relation to England, the thing to which you remember George Washington referred when he said that if Ireland was 500 miles from England there would be no Irish question. When you think of the relation of Ireland to England, it puts England in a place where she can control the ocean, as she can not control the ocean unless she controls Ireland. While it is true that England made last year $225,000,000 out of the control of Ireland, the real secret for insisting upon keeping her control of Ireland is that she wants to be able to control the seas. She can do that because of the geographical position of Ireland. You will remember that you can not approach the southern coast of England without approaching the southern coast of Ireland, and can not approach the northern coast of England without approaching the northern coast of Ireland. Under the circumstances, England is going to insist on control of Ireland.

As I say, she can make no greater contribution to the freedom of the world, can give no greater evidence of the desire to bring about a just and permanent peace, than to give her consent to having the republican form of government which has been set up in Ireland recognized by herself as well as the other nations of the world.

Passing from that, we contend that we must as Americans take a position in opposition to this proposed league of nations because of what it does with relation to the Monroe doctrine. We insist that the Monroe doctrine is one of the fundamental principles upon which American statesmanship has been reared, and that our foreign policy has recognized it as the great principle of American statesmanship, of American interests, and we say in relation to it that if instead of having peace made between belligerents this peace convention is going to give its attention to the settling of all problems in the future, so as to do away with the probability of some great war occurring in the world, it ought to take into question the conditions as they have existed up to the present time, and then the interests of America are the first thing that should be looked out for by those who represent and speak for America.

We point out that under the Monroe doctrine as it has been established we have grown in wealth, prosperity, and power as no nation in the history of the world has grown. And we say that the Monroe doctrine if it is to be changed should be changed not in the way of diminishing its power but in the way of strengthening its power. If there shall be a desire to make a permanent peace, the Monroe doctrine should be extended so that it shall include any European interests in the Western Hemisphere. Any European country which is represented here by territory should depart. Since the Monroe doctrine has been enunciated all the territory which is possessed in western America by them has been given up by Denmark, France, Spain, and Portugal, and the only power remaining in any large way upon this hemisphere, the only European power possessing territory of any extent in this country, is the British Empire, and we say that if there is going to be a permanent settlement to come out of these peace negotiations the people of Canada, our great neighbor on the north, ought to have submitted to them the question of taking their place among the republics of the Western Hemisphere, or even if an arrangement could be made of joining our country, and in the same way the territory that England has in the West Indies should be turned over to America or turned over to the independence of those islands in order that there may be no further menace of American commerce, so far as the Western Hemisphere is concerned.

We Irish think that there should be no abandonment of the policy laid down by Washington in his Farewell Address of keeping away from permanent entangling alliances with any of the countries of the Old World. We point out that this has been the policy which has been followed strictly by America and has resulted probably more than anything else in strengthening the extraordinary position we occupy to-day. As the Senator from Pennsylvania said so well yesterday, the only great solvent power left, practically, on the earth is the United States, and it is the duty of those representing America to continue this policy, and we urge that in acting for the welfare of America care should be taken to see that that doctrine should be upheld, and that the advice of Washington should be continued and lived up to in such a way that we should neither take part in the quarrels of the Old World nor permit them to take part in our quarrels.

We urge, then, further, coming down to specific things, that as far as article 10 of the proposed league of nations is concerned, we most emphatically protest against that. We say under it that we are asked to make the greatest departure from American traditions of statesmanship that have ever been made. We are asked to abandon the position that we have taken up to this day, as we did in Cuba, to give aid where people have been struggling to be free, and we would be unable to extend our sympathies to people struggling all over the world, and who are struggling to be free, if we guarantee the territorial integrity of existing nations. Under the proposed league of nations we should have to guarantee the territorial integrity of the Japanese Empire, the British Empire, the only two empires remaining, and guarantee to them the possession of all the spoils and the loot that they have gathered up in their existence in all parts of the world. No relief could be given Ireland as in the sixteenth century Spain went to the help of Ireland in her fight against England, for we would be compelled to make a fight, and would be compelled to send our men into Ireland, not for the purpose of helping them in their struggle but in order to help England to rivet the chains upon her.

We point out that if France should desire to assist Ireland as she did in the seventeenth century and the eighteenth century she would be compelled to do the same thing.

We say that it is utterly un-American, that it is against our best interest, against our highest ideals and against our highest ambition, and we point out the facts, so well known, that if a league of nations had been in existence at the time of the Revolution France could not have come to the assistance of the Thirteen Colonies, or if it had been in existence at the time of the Spanish-American War we could not have gone to the assistance of Cuba to help Cuba to obtain the position that she now occupies among the republics of the world.

Now, so far as Ireland is concerned, of course we understand that this discussion here should be very largely confined to the proposed league of nations. But we want to point out some of the conditions over there with relation to this that show the condition of affairs in the British Empire. We say that no people on earth held in oppression, held practically in slavery, have ever shown such an extraordinary political unanimity in the expression of their desire for the form of government under which they live and to become again one of the free nations of the world. I say that Ireland is able to support herself—to stand upon her feet. England last year made from Ireland $25,000,000, gathered in taxation, according to her own figures some £34,000,000, equivalent to $170,000,000; that she spent for the government of Ireland some £13,000,000, leaving a profit of £21,000,000, or $101,000,000, taking $5 as the value of a pound.

We say that last year, by reason of her absolute control of the sea, by reason of the fact that she shut Ireland off absolutely from contact with the rest of the world, so far as commerce is concerned, compelling Ireland to sell everything she has to sell through an English channel and everything she has to buy and compelling her to buy everything she has to buy from the western world through an English channel, that she did 95 per cent of the business of Ireland.

Sir Horace Plunkett says that Ireland's business with the rest of the world amounted to $820,000,000. The English statistics, so far as we can get them, show that this amount was $860,000,000 instead of $820,000,000. And we say that the English trader, who has no peer in greatness, has made an ultimate turnover of $120,000,000.

We say that since the equity union was appointed by Gladstone in 1894, composed of 19 men, 9 Englishmen, after two years of investigation of English data, they reported that Ireland, instead of costing the English money, that from January, 1891, to 1896, they had overpaid into the English treasury in the form of overtaxation the sum of £2,715,000, or the equivalent of $14,000,000, which means that for the 20 years since the formation of the union England had taken out of Ireland in that period over $1,700,000,000. We call your attention to that staggering sum even in these days. When they wanted to destroy France they imposed an indemnity of $1,000,000,000; but here, in a country two-thirds the size of that, they have taken from Ireland in overtaxation a much greater sum.

In the last 70 years, between 1845 and 1915, the population of Ireland has been practically cut in two. In 1845 the population was practically 8,500,000—between 8,250,000 and 8,500,000. According to the census taken in 1915 by the British Government, the population was a little over 4,000,000. We say that you can not find any parallel in the history of the world as that.

Senator KNOX. From what years?

Judge COHALAN. Seventy years; from 1845 to 1915.

Senator KNOX. There is a parallel in Central America.

Judge COHALAN. I did not know that you could find one.

Senator KNOX. That is under very benighted conditions.

Judge COHALAN. I would say, in relation to that, by way of comparison, that the peoples of the Continent of Europe that were most strongly tyrannized over—if you put it in that way, the nations against whose governments the strongest complaints were made by those over whom they were working and who suffered under such a condition of affairs, during the time that Alsace-Lorraine was under German rule—grew and prospered in population; Schleswig-Holstein under German rule grew and prospered; and there has been no parallel, except as Senator KNOX has indicated as to Central America.

We say that we are dependent for four months of every year upon the foreign markets of the world to find some place in which to sell our goods in order that our factories may run to their full capacity and the men may be employed.

In 1913 the business between England and the United States amounted to $875,000,000. The exports from America to England were $700,000,000, while the imports from England to America were $175,000,000. The export business between England and Ireland was $675,000,000 and the imports were around $350,000,000, so that England found in Ireland a place to which to send her manufactured goods to the extent of twice that she found in this country.

In 1845 the population of England was 9,000,000 and the population of Ireland was 6,000,000. The size of England is 50,000 square miles and Ireland 32,000 square miles, showing that the proportion of population of Ireland should be two-thirds that of England. That was the condition when the act of union passed on the 1st of January, 1801, which Gladstone characterized as the most corrupt act ever passed in England.

We say that the proposed league of nations is un-American and that it can not be depended on to guard the interests of America; that it can not safeguard the interests of America. We speak for people who are devoted to America above everything else, who have done everything possible to stand by American traditions and ideals. We urge upon you very strongly, speaking practically for one of every five persons in America, and we urge that the Senate report against this proposed league of nations and recommend that the Senate reject it; and if under any circumstances any part of it should be accepted, that under no condition should article 10 or article 11 be accepted, or any of the other things which we have pointed out, from which, as we have pointed out, there would be a curtailment of American sovereignty and American independence. We are opposed to the whole league of nations. We believe it is un-American, and urge and insist that in it there can be no justice and no just and permanent peace, and that by adopting it you are only making for a continuance of the war.

Senator MOSES. Judge Cohalan, you spoke of your speaking for one of every five persons in the United States. Do you intend to imply that there are 20,000,000 of inhabitants of this country who are of Irish origin?

Judge COHALAN. We think there are many more than that.

Senator MOSES. And the views that you express are shared by that 20,000,000?

Judge COHALAN. Suppose I give you some evidence of it. I would like to put on the record the reasons I have for that opinion. On the 22d and 23d of February, in the city of Philadelphia, I had the honor of presiding over the most patriotic gathering of American citizens that I have ever seen. There were 32 accredited delegates to the convention. The resolutions that were passed were offered by Cardinal Gibbons, seconded by a distinguished Episcopalian minister and by a distinguished Presbyterian minister and by a famous Jewish rabbi. There were representatives from every one of the Irish societies all over the country. Judge Deery, president of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, was there, and Mrs. McWhorter, representing the Women's Branch of the Order of Hibernians, representing a membership of over 150,000. And after seeing this representation there I think that we can feel assured that we are speaking practically for the great bulk of the Irish citizens in urging this action.

Senator MOSES. Can you explain, then, why it is that the Irish Senators are so lukewarm?

Judge COHALAN. Senator, I came here for the purpose of making an argument showing our position to-day. I came here to make an argument that would appeal to all the Senators, no matter what races they represent, and when the hearing is concluded I hope that the Senators will be convinced.

Senator JOHNSON of California. The difficulty is that you have been addressing yourself thus far to members of this committee who are of one mind upon this subject.

Judge COHALAN. Looking around and seeing the number of them, I am glad that that is so.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I wish it were possible for you to address them all.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you ready to go on?

Judge COHALAN. I am going to call upon Mr. Patrick J. Lynch, of the Supreme Court of Indiana, to read the memorial on the behalf of those who have come here. They have come from practically every State in the Union, from all walks in life, and from all over the country. We wish that it were possible to get people from the different parts of the country to be heard, but we have prepared a general memorial, and then later we will hand in the names of those who have signed.

The following memorial was read by Mr. Patrick J. Lynch:

MEMORIAL TO THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

"SENATORS: We, citizens of the United States, of Irish blood, but attached above all things to this Republic and its Constitution, respectfully pray that the proposed treaty now before you be rejected as a direct violation of the principles on which this war was fought as they were defined by President Wilson in these words, addressed to Congress:

"'National aspirations must be respected; peoples may now be dominated and governed only by their own consent. "Self-determination" is not a mere phrase. It is an imperative principle of action, which statesmen will henceforth ignore at their peril.'

"And, again, in the President's address delivered at Mount Vernon July 4, 1918:

"'The settlement of every question, whether of territory, of sovereignty, of economic arrangement, or of political relationship, upon the basis of the free acceptance of that settlement by the people immediately concerned, and not upon the basis of the material interest or advantage of any other nation or people which may desire a different settlement for the sake of its own exterior influence or mastery.'

"On these principles other nations which have claimed their right to independence only during a period comparatively recent have been emancipated. To them America was bound by no ties save that of sympathy for the cause of freedom.

"Ireland has been asserting continuously her claim to independence for eight centuries. America is bound to her by close ties of friendship and of obligation for manifold services in peace and war. One-fifth of this entire population is of Irish extraction. In every war which America has fought Irishmen have shed their blood in a measure far in excess of their proportion to population. We ask that Ireland be not the only nation excluded from the benefit of the glorious principles enunciated by Mr. Wilson, as those which the Great War was fought to establish.

"We especially denounce article 10 of the proposed league of nations as a device to stifle the conscience of civilization and render it impotent to condemn, and, by condemning, to end the oppression of weak nations enslaved by powerful neighbors. It impeaches the most creditable page in our history and discredits the circumstances and conditions in which our Republic was born and our liberty achieved.

"The conscience of civilization, the only force to which the oppressed can appeal, would no longer be able to take effective jurisdiction of wrongs perpetrated by powerful nations on weaker people. No struggling nation has ever achieved its independence except through the aid of other nations. The struggling American Colonies could never have thrown off the yoke of Great Britain without the aid of France. Cuba could never have been freed without the intervention of this country, and one of the most creditable pages in human history would never have been written.

"Greece could never have escaped from the hideous domination of the Turk but for the assistance of enlightened nations.

"Under article 11 it becomes the right of the council of the league to prevent an assembly of American citizens to petition their Government to afford relief to an oppressed nation. On this point article 11 specifically says:

"'It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations on which peace depends.'

"Under that clause our Congress could not express in the future, as it did in the past, our sympathy with countries like Greece, seeking freedom from the Turk; the South American Republics, seeking liberty from Spain; or tender a welcome to Kossuth, of stricken Hungary; or Parnell, pleading for a self-governing Ireland.

"The determination of Ireland to regain her independence has been one of the sources of every great war which scourged the world for four centuries. Any question which disturbs the peace of nations is not domestic, but international. Its settlement is, therefore, an imperative necessity of international peace.

"Through long centuries of oppression Ireland has maintained her national spirit largely because she has always hitherto been able to cherish a hope that she might receive from some well-disposed foreign power the assistance which would insure her independence. She looked to Spain for this aid at the close of the sixteenth century; to France in the seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. She looks for it now in the twentieth century to America, and we confidently hope and pray that the Senate will not allow that light of hope to be extinguished.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I would like the record to state the names of those present.

The CHAIRMAN. The clerk will call the roll.

The clerk called the roll, and the following members answered to their names: Senators LODGE, BORAH, BRANDEGEE, FALL, KNOX, HARDING, JOHNSON, NEW, MOSES, SWANSON, and PITTMAN.

The CHAIRMAN. There are 12 Senators present, a quorum. Judge Cohalan, you may put on your next speaker.

Senator BORAH. Before that is done, Mr. Chairman, I want to make a suggestion with reference to the gentlemen who are still to address the committee. The argument has been made by the advocates of the league and by some of our colleagues that under the league of nations Ireland would have a better opportunity or a better chance of having her affairs settled in harmony with her aspirations than without it. You gentlemen having kept close tab, undoubtedly, upon the debate along that line of argument, will appreciate what I say. I would like to have some one address his attention to that feature of the question.

Judge COHALAN. That will be done during the course of the hearing. Mr. Chairman, I want to put in the record a memorial with certain figures.

The CHAIRMAN. They will be printed, and as our time is limited, we will not take the time to read them now.

Judge COHALAN. Very well. Mr. Chairman, I am also going to file Ireland's declaration of independence along with other official documents, and some extension of my remarks.

The extension of Judge Cohalan's remarks and the declaration of independence referred to are here printed in full, as follows:

"The great trouble with the mass of the people of America on the question of Ireland is their viewpoint on the Irish question. Without intending to be unfair, they take for granted the justice of the English view. They find England, largely the mistress of the world and in many ways admitted to be the leader of modern civilization, in possession of Ireland.

"They find, according to histories mainly written by England's friends, that she has been thus in Ireland for centuries, and they take it for granted that she must be there legally; that she is there as a matter of right. They take for granted, too, that in the evolution of civilization, in the making of history, that conditions required her to be there, and that England's claim to the overlordship in Ireland is a valid and just claim.

"This view is strengthened by all the literature which most Americans ever read. The so-called English literature with which Americans come in contact usually rates England as the one great power which, through the centuries past, has been carrying aloft the torch of justice and progress into the dark corners of the world. So, it is not to be wondered at that many Americans are prone to think of England as the guiding star of civilization, educating and lifting up downtrodden, suffering people that have been tyrannized over by their national tyrants.

"This is the view of England that Englishmen like to have the world take of their country. Because of this viewpoint, it is extremely difficult to get before the American jury—fair as it intends to be—the actual facts of history, not to speak of the present-day conditions as they exist in Ireland.

"THE DOMINATING FIGURES IN ENGLAND.

"The ordinary American, accustomed to giving almost all of his time to a study of the internal conditions of his own country, so far as his interests lead him on, has not learned to differentiate between the England which is and the England that, according to her writers and poets, seems to be.

"He has not come to understand that the English democracy of which he hears and reads so much has little reality in fact, and that England still continues to be governed by a handful of men, representing, with but few exceptions, the same small group of titled land-controlling families that have governed England since the days of Henry XIII, if not, in fact, much longer. Since the downfall of continental aristocracies this is true of England more than of any other country.

"The dominating figures in England to-day—those in actual power—are the Cecils and their relations. Lloyd-George or some other figure that has come to represent democracy or radicalism, if you will, in the eyes of the world, is put forward as the premier of governing authority. But the will that dominates, controls, and finally directs the policies and actions of England is that of the master spirit Cecil, no matter which member of that family or its connections it may happen to be.

"In the last generation it was the Marquis of Salisbury, former premier of England, the man who said, some 40 years ago, that England and America were natural rivals in every court and in every port; the man who more than any other—with the exception of Joseph Chamberlain, the great radical who ratted and joined the forces of conservation—was responsible for the destruction of the two little Republics in South Africa.

"It was this same Salisbury who said, in the days when the Irish were carrying everything before them in the Parliamentary fights in the House of Commons, that the Irish were no better than the Hottentots and should receive the same treatment. It was the same man who represented England in the Congress of Berlin and of whom Bismarck said—because he quit when opposed by superior force—that he reminded him of a lath painted to look like iron.

"Salisbury was aided and was succeeded by his nephew, Arthur James Balfour, who became premier of England, first lord of the admiralty, and a number of other high-sounding things, but who has never been able to wipe out the title of 'Bloody Balfour,' conferred upon him by the people of Ireland when he was chief secretary for Ireland, and, among other things, ordered the shooting, if necessary, by the troops, in cold blood, of the defenseless, unarmed people of Mitchelstown.

"Balfour is still to the fore and is probably the chief governing force in England to-day, except in so far as he is displaced by his cousin, Lord Robert Cecil, son of the Marquis of Salisbury and father of the proposed league of nations—which would, if it became effective, undo the work of the revolution and put us in the position of again being a vassal state of England, subject to the control of the Cecils or any other landed aristocracy that might in the future control the destines of England and the world.

"These are types of the men who dominate England, and, through her, control the British Empire. The little King George V, first cousin to the late Emperor of the Germans and the Czar of the Russians, at present represents the German royal family as King of England and Emperor of India.

"He rules over every third person on earth and over almost every third square mile of land on earth. He is actually master of all the seas and is at the head of a Government more powerful than any which ever before existed in all the history of mankind.

"Englishmen like to say that King George reigns but does not rule. That is true. The real ruling force is that handful of aristocrats who represent the landed feudal aristocracy of England and who form the most absolute, most arbitrary, and most powerful autocracy the world has ever seen.

"ENGLAND MAKES OTHER NATIONS SUPPLY THE SOLDIERS.

"The history of England differs from that of every other country. No other country before her has reached her dominant place among the empires of the earth. Rome approached nearer to England than did any other country in similarity of methods by which she acquired world control. Her imperial motto, 'Divide et Impera,' marked the policy by which she subdued almost the entire world of her day and ruled the known world without a rival for centuries.

"But Rome acquired most of her power through her own soldiers. The generals who led her armies to victory were of Roman blood; the soldiers who swept everything before them on the field of battle were Roman legions, who found few who could stand before them. They risked their own lives, their own blood, for the quarrels of their country, in order that her will might be imposed upon other countries.

"England has improved on all this. She follows the Roman motto, but because England leaves the control of the policy of her Government in the hands of her diplomats, other nations, other races, are made to supply the generals who win the battles, and the soldiers who bleed, in order that England may grow great.

"ENGLAND'S POLICY TAKES ADVANTAGE OF FRIEND AND FOE.

"The policy which had its beginning under Henry the Eighth has been consistently carried forward, subordinating every other interest to that of the growth of England and the extension of her power. It has been carried on through all the ages by every government which comes into power in England, no matter what its domestic policy may have been.

"Englishmen may differ upon domestic problems—upon questions of taxation, of education, of religion—but as against all foreigners they are a unit and their policy is always consistently to take advantage of all openings given them throughout the world, to make and unmake alliances, to make and break treaties, to take advantage of friend and foe in order to add to the wealth and power of England and to break down those who have stood against her.

"One of the results of this policy is seen to-day in the proud boast of England that the sun never sets on the British Empire. Her flag flies in triumph over territory in every continent and in most of the important islands of the seas. It is carried aloft as the flag controlling the power of every sea of the world.

"Her forts guard practically all the great narrow waterways of the earth, with the exception of the Panama Canal. Yet here, by reason of her extraordinary influence over American legislation, England has acquired for her commerce all the rights and privileges enjoyed by American commerce, although the Panama Canal belongs to us, was built by America and paid for by America's treasures.

"MOLDING PUBLIC OPINION OF THE WORLD.

"Another and, if possible, more important result of this policy of England is the extraordinary control she has gained over public opinion in every country in the world. Her soldiers have won battles for her on land, her admirals have won fights at sea, but these are as nothing when compared to the triumph of her diplomats. No group of men in the history of the world can compare in skill, in adroitness, in finesse, in influence, with the diplomats of England.

"The visible British Empire is an external monument of their triumph, but the invisible British Empire, with its control of influences in every Government on earth, its thousand and one ways of making opinion through the press, the magazines, the pulpits, the schools, of every race and in every clime, is a vaster, more far-reaching monument of their finesse, their adroitness, their ability to make black seem white.

"The Romans were satisfied with their triumph at arms. When their soldiers had beaten down those of the opponent, the generals and princes of the vanquished were brought to Rome and made to walk sub jugo through the streets, chained to the wheels of the chariot of the Roman Consul.

"The English diplomat, more skilled in human nature, more subtle, more far-reaching in his plans, is not satisfied with such outward marks of triumph. He carries on a campaign throughout the world, to justify his actions, and, if possible, to ease his own conscience. As an example:

"ENGLAND ATTEMPTS TO DESTROY THE SOUL OF IRELAND.

"Even though England by brute force has been in possession of the body of Ireland for centuries, the English diplomat continues his fight to destroy the soul of Ireland. Even though he has proclaimed, at the birth of each succeeding generation, that he has again conquered Ireland, he still keeps looking in vain for a declaration from the people of Ireland that they have been conquered.

"He tells himself that he has beaten the Irish because of the thousand and one cruelties he has practiced upon them, but he knows in his heart that he can not conquer the Irish people while one man and one woman of Irish blood survive.

"He knows—if the world does not know—that the people of Ireland want absolute independence. He has been able with a thousand subterfuges to confuse the thought of the world on the question of what Ireland wants, but he can not deceive himself.

"The Balfours and Cecils of this generation know, as well as Burleigh, their relative, in the days of the reign of Elizabeth knew, that what Ireland wants is to have England get out of Ireland, bag and baggage, and leave the people of Ireland to govern their own country in their own way.

"IRELAND IS UNITED FOR ABSOLUTE INDEPENDENCE.

"In the last analysis, the question between England and Ireland is simplicity itself. There are two nations, each of which wishes to rule, govern, own Ireland. One is the Irish nation, to whom Ireland belongs, for whom it was set apart by God Almighty himself for all the rest of the world.

"The Irish people have dwelt in Ireland for thousands of years, distinct and separate in a hundred ways from all other peoples, set apart in nature, in thought, in language, in custom from the rest of the world, marked by the hand of God with an individuality all their own.

"The Irish people have their own strength, their own virtues, their own gifts, their own weaknesses, but differ from and are different to any and all other races of men. The Irish people have absorbed all other strains of blood that have gone into the strange country of Ireland so as to have made strangers who have gone there, after a few generations, an integral part of themselves, or, as an old writer phrased it, 'more Irish than the Irish themselves.'

"The other nation that wishes to own, govern, and rule Ireland is the English nation, belonging to England but foreign to Ireland. A nation of great gifts, great failings; a nation that may yet, in the providence of God, reach the point where it can be made to see that it will be greater to conquer themselves than to conquer a city or a world; greater to bring peace, contentment, and opportunity for decent living, not to some portion of itself but to all its peoples, so that it may not be said in the future, as it was said in the past, in a recent report of a British commission, that one-third of the people of England did not have a week between themselves and starvation.

"IRELAND ONLY WANTS WHAT BELONGS TO HER.

"If the question between Ireland and England were between two individuals, no jury sitting in any part of America would have any difficulty in disposing of the matter. Ireland does not ask anything of England except to be let alone. She wants only what belongs to her. She wants only that which was her own. She wants to govern herself and her own people in her own way, according to her own standards, and with absolute religious freedom and political equality for all of her children.

"Ireland does not ask one inch of territory that is not contained within the four seas of Ireland. She does not ask to impose her will upon a single person who dwells beyond her shores. She appeals to the free people of the earth for the opportunity to go her own way, in peace and harmony with all the rest of mankind. She offers not alone to forgive, but so far as she can, even to forget past dealings with England and to dwell in peace and amity and concord with England as a neighbor.

"But she refuses, as she has refused for 750 years, to permit the stranger—England—to govern her, to control her resources, to shut her off from contact with the other nations of the earth, to keep her out of her high place among the nations. She says, with the voice of a united people—not in a quarrelsome way, but in the quiet voice of reasoned judgment—that as she has fought for 750 years for her independence, so she is prepared to fight, if necessary, as long again in order to attain that independence, and to resume her place among the independent nations.

"Her sons say for her, quite calmly, with knowledge of the fact that though scattered all over the world, they yet remain a great race, that England with all her power, with all her subtlety, with all her barbarity, can not destroy them or wipe them out. That the fight which England waged through so many centuries can only end when England shall withdraw her last soldier from Ireland and leave that country, which she has been robbing for centuries, to govern and rule herself.

"The diplomat of England has succeeded in many parts of the world as has no other diplomat in the history of mankind, but he has failed in Ireland as absolutely and completely as any diplomat has failed in other parts of the world.

"It may be said without exaggeration that England has tried for centuries every form of tyranny, of cruelty, of inhumanity in her treatment of the people of Ireland. Her chief spokesman, Lloyd-George, admitted in the House of Commons last year that England had made an absolute failure of her government of Ireland, and that to-day she was as unpopular with the mass of the people of Ireland as she was in the days of Oliver Cromwell.

"BELGIAN ATROCITIES DUPLICATED A HUNDREDFOLD IN IRELAND.

"In the early stages of the late Great War, the world was made familiar with the story of the treatment the Belgians received in their own country at the hands of the invaders. It was but the recital and summary of England's treatment of Ireland. Not an atrocity was charged against the Germans in Belgium, not a cruelty was practiced, not a crime committed, which could not be duplicated a hundredfold in England's treatment of Ireland.

"Proof of this fact need only be taken from the admissions of English historians; from the declarations of English statesmen—the only difference between Belgium and Ireland being that the atrocities in Belgium extended over a period of three or four years, while the atrocities of England in Ireland have extended over the centuries.

"Belgium to-day, with a chorus of thanksgiving from all over the world, has resumed her place among the free nations of the earth and is to be indemnified in so far as money can indemnify a suffering country for losses sustained.

"Ireland to-day, after seven and a half centuries of greater suffering, still lies prostrate at the feet of England, while English statesmen, with a smug hypocrisy all their own, dilate with well-stimulated astonishment on the dreadful fact that England can not leave Ireland to be governed by Irishmen, because, forsooth, the Irish can not agree politically among themselves.

"NO SUCH POLITICAL UNANIMITY EXISTS ELSEWHERE IN THE WORLD.

"The fact is, however, that there is in Ireland to-day a degree of political unanimity greater than exists in any other country on earth—very much greater than that which exists in England, where Lloyd-George and his confreres are kept in power through a political coalition between eight different groups, and much greater than exists in our own country.

"Ireland is the only country in the world in which a plebescite has been taken since the armistice was declared last November. The result of that plebescite was that the people of Ireland, by a vote of more than three to one, declared in favor of absolute separation from England and in favor of the establishment of an Irish Republic.

"This was on the 14th of last December. On the 21st day of January of this year the elected representatives of the people of Ireland met in convention at the Mansion House in the city of Dublin, declared the existence of the Irish republic, and made an appeal to the free peoples of the earth for its international recognition.

"In furtherance of that appeal, Eamon de Valera, president of the Irish republic, and several members of the Dail Eireann (Irish congress) are now in this country. They seek to lay before the people of America actual conditions as they exist in Ireland to-day. They ask a hearing in order that America may understand that what the people of Ireland are asking is full recognition of their status as a free and independent people.

"They seek not some redress of grievances, large or small, but they demand that England take her grip off Ireland and leave the country to be governed by its own people in its own way. The opinion of America has been aroused within the last year as it never has been before in favor of Ireland.

"ENGLAND AIMS TO CONFUSE THE ISSUE.

"But the English diplomats, with their accustomed skill, are seeking to confuse the issue, to prevent our people from getting a clear understanding of what is at stake between Ireland and England.

"It is their task, their duty at this time, not to simplify but to complicate the issue; not to clarify, but to confuse the situation. Because of that, there appear in a hundred forms, a hundred suggestions from England as to a way out of the difficulty.

"One group talks of dominion home rule, while others talk of a dozen varieties of the same form. Carson talks of having conditions remain as they are, while Smuts—the 'slim' South African who believes all peoples should continue to be swallowed up by the British Empire—comes forward with that latest suggestion that Ireland should receive the same recognition as that given to Bohemia.

"But all ask for Ireland something which England wants—none offers to Ireland that which Ireland demands; because at bottom—let them explain as they may—in any one of the hundred devious devices English statesmen and historians have used in attempting to explain it—the fact is that England remains in Ireland for England's profit, security, and power, and does not intend to get out of Ireland until she is persuaded, either by force or by the prospect of greater profit in some other form, that it is to her interest to do so.

"England says she remains in Ireland only for two reasons: First, because Irishmen can not agree politically, and, second, because Ireland can not financially stand alone. Neither statement has the slightest foundation in fact.

"PLEBESCITE TAKEN IN DECEMBER REFUTES FIRST CLAIM.

"The plebescite taken in Ireland last December, under the most adverse conditions, shows that the people of Ireland have reached a degree of political unanimity practically without parallel. With the great English Army of occupation and with all the machinery of the Government in possession of the English garrison, the people of Ireland, by a vote of more than 3 to 1, decided in favor of total separation of Ireland from England.

"According to the standard American histories, Washington and his associates were never able to rally to their support more than a majority of the colonists, if, in truth, they ever had so large a proportion of the colonists on their side.

"Even in the so-called convention presided over by Sir Horace Plunkett and hand picked by Lloyd-George, there was a majority of 40 to 29 in favor of the proposed plan then given, which would have gone beyond the scheme of so-called settlement now proposed by many responsible spokesmen for England. This is the more remarkable when it is considered that a large number of the members of that body were selected by Lloyd-George and his associates for the express purpose of having them fail to agree to any settlement.

"If the situation were not one of so much importance it would be farcical to hear Lloyd-George talk about the failure of the Irish to agree, when he himself remains in power in England through a coalition made up of eight different groups, and was the direct cause of the so-called failure to which he refers.

"ENGLAND REMAINS IN IRELAND FOR HER OWN FINANCIAL GAIN.

"England dares not say that she remains in Ireland because Ireland can not financially stand alone. This, in spite of the fact that last year England made at least $225,000,000 from her control of Ireland. She collected from Ireland and on Irish goods during the preceding year a revenue of more than £34,000,000. She spent on what she is pleased to call the 'government' of Ireland about £13,000,000, leaving a profit to herself of £21,000,000, an equivalent of about $105,000,000 profit gathered to herself through taxation of Ireland.

"Ireland did with the rest of the world the previous year a busines of $820,000,000, according to Sir Horace Plunkett, though other spokesmen for England say this estimate is entirely too low. Of the foreign business done by Ireland, more than 95 per cent was done with England. Why? Because England has so completely cut Ireland off from the rest of the world that she is unable to send goods abroad except through England, or to buy abroad except through England, thus being compelled, against all economic law, to sell in the cheapest market and to buy in the dearest market.

"It is only fair to presume, as a result of this, that the English tradesman, who is as shrewd, as adroit, as far seeing in his own field as is the English diplomat in the field of government, made a profit of at least 15 per cent on the turn over of this business with Ireland.

"Ireland thus gives to England, in addition to the taxation, the profit of $120,000,000, thus making for England in a single year a profit of vast proportions—a profit of $225,000,000 from her control of Ireland. That sum represents 225,000,000 reasons why England wishes to remain in Ireland. She is there as a matter of profit. She is there as a matter of interest. But above all other reasons, strong and selfish as they are, England remains in Ireland because she regards her continued control of Ireland as vital and essential to her continued control of the seas.

"ENGLAND USES IRELAND FOR A GREAT DAIRY FARM.

"Much has been made by the spokesmen of England of the claim that Ireland must remain attached to England because England is the chief market for Irish goods, and the country through which Ireland's commerce with the world must be carried on, if Ireland is to seek a world market.

"No more damning indictment could be brought against England than is brought by this bit of English propaganda. The simple outstanding fact is that England does not buy one dollar's worth of goods from Ireland which she could buy cheaper in any other part of the world. Further, because of her absolute control of the seas of the world, and of her economic contact with every other country on earth, England does not sell to Ireland one single article, no matter how insignificant, for which she could find a better price in any other part of the globe.

"England uses Ireland for a great dairy farm, a broad grazing land, in order that food may be provided at the lowest possible price, for the teeming millions in the industrial centers of England. She uses Ireland as a dumping ground for the excess products of her factories—excess products which are turned out by her manufacturers either to meet special competition in some other country or in order to keep her industrial workers employed so that they may not have time to think too much about the grievances and the industrial problems that lead to revolution.

"ENGLAND DESTROYED THE POPULATION OF IRELAND.

"The world recently rang with English propaganda in the form of stories of the tyrannies of the Czar of the Russias and of the government of the Central Empires. These empires have gone, and properly gone, the ways of every other tyrant of past history, but the fact remains that at their worst these powers did not keep the population of Alsace-Loraine, of Schleswig-Holstein, of Galicia from greatly increasing in numbers and in prosperity.

"Nor did the brutalities and outrageous excesses of power of the successive Czars of the Russias prevent Russian Poland from growing greatly in population and in wealth. Yet in the 70 years from 1845 to 1915, the population of Ireland, under what English spokesmen are pleased to call the benign reigns of Victoria, of Edward VII, and of George V, has decreased from more than 8,750,000 to 4,390,219.

"GOVERNMENT-MADE FAMINES TO DESTROY THE PEOPLE OF IRELAND.

"In that time, in spite of the cruelties and misgovernment practiced upon the people of those continental countries, no charge has been made and has been proved—as in the case of Ireland—of a government-made famine in which more than one million starved to death in a land of plenty, and another two million were sent across the seas to seek in foreign countries an opportunity to live, an opportunity of which they were deprived in their own land by reason of the inhumanity of an alien government.

"England has systematically broken down every effort made to build up the industries, to develop the resources of Ireland, while her spokesmen sing in chorus that all the wrongs of Ireland are ancient wrongs and that Ireland is to-day governed by the same laws that govern England, and therefore the Irish people should be contented with their lot and cease to cry for liberty.

"These assertions do not bear the slightest investigation of an impartial mind. Ireland has been turned into a grazing country by the laws of England and by acts of the English Government. The system of laws made for a highly complex industrial State like England are utterly out of place in a country whose main pursuit is made to be agriculture.

"GREAT HARBORS OF IRELAND IN IDLENESS.

"The shipping controlled by England cuts Ireland off from all contact with the rest of the world and keeps in idleness 20 of the greatest harbors of Europe. It prevents the modern development of the ports of Cork, Limerick, Galway, Sligo, and Dublin, ports which centuries ago were great trading ports, carrying on extensive commerce with the countries of continental Europe.

"The railroads of the smaller and poorer country are controlled by the railroads of the richer and larger country, so that it cost until recently as much to send a barrel of flour across from Galway to Dublin as it would to send it from Chicago to Liverpool.

"Most of the banks in Ireland are bought up or controlled by the banks of England, with the result that the deposits are not invested in Ireland for the development of its resources or the upbuilding of its industries, but are placed at the disposal of English manufacturers and business men to aid in their schemes for exploiting the rest of the world and beating down the industrial rivals of England in Europe and in the United States of America.

"The Irish mercantile marine, which for centuries carried on a commerce with continental Europe and America, has been wiped out of existence by adverse English laws. It has been replaced only by ships which bring Ireland's goods to England and England's goods to Ireland in such a manner as to make the Irish market to all intents and purposes the private monopoly of England.

"England, roughly speaking, is one and one-half times the size of Ireland in square miles. When the act of union was laid upon Ireland, January 1, 1801, the population of Ireland was almost 6,000,000 and the population of England was less than 9,000,000. To-day, the population of England is over 36,000,000, and the population of Ireland, according to the latest English census, is 4,390,219. At the same date which marks the application of the act of union to Ireland, the population of Scotland was 1,700,000, while to-day, for the first time in history, it is larger than the population of Ireland.

"IRELAND VICIOUSLY MISREPRESENTED ABROAD.

"If Ireland had been satisfied to become the contented province of England and to abandon her fight for liberty and her desire for independence; if she would consent to become absorbed into England, to become a part of the English people, she would undoubtedly enjoy a prosperity that would mean all that the word implies.

"It is because of the fact that she will not consent to such an arrangement, it is because she regards the ideal as of more consequence, even in this life, than she does the material, that Ireland must continue to be misrepresented abroad. If England has her way, her rule will continue in Ireland until that day and that generation when the British Empire, following all the other mighty empires of the past, shall hear the hour of her doom strike and shall be compelled to give way to the onward march of events which will carry its end into the mighty empire and bring freedom to the peoples all over the earth who are oppressed by it. Thoughtful observers the world over agree that that day is not far distant.

"England has time after time overrun Ireland with her armies, with her confiscators, but she has never conquered Ireland, and unless all signs by which the future may be gauged fail, she never can conquer Ireland.

"To-day England faces an Irish race scattered all over the world, totaling 30,000,000 of people. She may boast that the sun never sets on the British Empire, but she must also admit that it never sets on the man of Irish blood. Wherever he has gone, into whatever country he may have been absorbed, he remains distinctively hostile to the British Government and the things for which that Government stands.

"He was, as American historians tell us, the first to raise the banner of revolt against England in this country. According to that scholarly volume, Hidden Phases of American History, by Michael J. O'Brien, 38 per cent of the rank and file of Washington's Army were Irishmen or sons of Irishmen—the most determined, the most unfaltering enemy England had in America.

"He harbors no enmity against the English people. He pities rather than condemns them for the injustice under which they suffer. He understands the economic slavery which is imposed upon them—but he is the untiring, the unfaltering enemy of the conscienceless chicanery and corrupting materialism which are the chief weapons of English diplomacy.

"AMERICA WAS LED INTO THE WAR TO PUT AN END TO AUTOCRACY.

"England may control statesmen, she may thunder from the pulpits, and she may speak through the impersonal editorials of the press in various countries. She may purchase poets, she may hire apologists, she may rewrite school histories, but ever and always there will be men rising up throughout the world to thwart her schemes, to prevent the consummation of her carefully laid plans, to point out the facts of history, and to arouse the liberty-loving people of the world to a realization of the fact that there can be no freedom on earth until the autocracy which hides behind the mask of navalism is as completely broken as was that which was covered by the garb of militarism.

"England may succeed—as she has succeeded—in cajoling or outmaneuvering the spokesmen of free peoples at the conference of Versailles; she may write the terms of peace there as she wrote them at Vienna a century before—but she can not stifle the conscience of the world. She can not satisfy America with the assertion that the war has been won because German and Russian militarism has been broken.

"America was led into the war to put an end to autocracy, and that means autocracy in every form. America entered the war to break down special privileges in all Governments and to see that not only militarism, but its twin sister, navalism, was broken beyond repair.

"If America had not gone into the war, it would have ended in an entirely different way. We threw our strength, our youth, our vigor, our idealism into the scales and we freely expressed our belief that when we won—for there was no 'if' about it once we went into the war—there would be an end to autocracy.

"We declared there would be self-determination for all peoples; that there would be freedom of the seas—that freedom for which America through all her history has contended and for which she waged one victorious war.

"America won the war, Sir Douglas Haig's comments to the contrary notwithstanding. America threw her soul, her honor, her ideals into the winning of the war, and America will not now be satisfied until all the peoples of the earth gather in the fruits of that victory.

"There can be no just or permanent peace if, after destroying one form of autocracy, we leave another form more strongly intrenched than ever and resting upon a firmer foundation. The plain people throughout the world will not rest while two great empires remain, their strength buttressed and fortified by a peace which able spokesmen of these empires, with superior courage, superior diplomacy, with greater skill, impose upon mankind.

"America magnificently won the war. America has failed to make the peace. America's spokesmen laid down splendidly the terms of peace which were to satisfy the world and which were agreed to in advance by the spokesmen of England, of France, of Italy. But America's spokesmen have been outplayed, outclassed, by the veteran diplomats of the latter countries.

"America was satisfied with the proposed terms of peace. She is utterly dissatisfied with the proposed peace treaty and its accompanying league of nations as drawn by Cecil and Smuts and now urged by the President of the United States as something behind which he may hide the discomfiture resulting from his encounter with the skilled diplomats of the Old World.

"Gloss over the story as one may, the fact remains that out of the conference at Versailles there have emerged two great powers greatly strengthened—the island empires of England and Japan. These two empires are now seizing and taking to themselves the choicest spots on earth, adding tremendously to their already swollen power.

"THE WAR, FOUGHT FOR DEMOCRACY, ENTHRONES AUTOCRACY.

"England, whose spokesman assured us one hundred times during the war that she sought no territory, has had, in her own accustomed style, forced upon her "unwilling" shoulders huge strips of land which nominally belonged to the German Empire but which really belonged to their inhabitants. These people, as the result of the war, are simply transferred from one group of exploiters to another, and a more experienced group.

"Forty million Chinese Republicans were torn from their own country with the immense Province of Shantung and turned over to the Empire of Japan, thus making it larger, in point of population, than the United States of America.

"England, which, before we entered the war, on the visit of Balfour to Washington, was in the throes of despair and on the verge of defeat, can now proudly proclaim through her mouthpiece, Lord Cecil, that she emerges from the war richer and stronger, actually and relatively, than any other country on earth.

"The war, fought for democracy, may end with a peace which greatly increases the power of autocracy. The war, fought to bring freedom of the seas, ends with England in unquestioned control of all the oceans of the earth. The war, fought to bring self-determination to all the peoples of the earth, has the doctrine of English predetermination applied to some parts of the continent, in order temporarily to break up and permanently to cripple her European rivals. This doctrine is applied to Asia in such a way that the Japanese predetermination may apply to the continent of Asia to the end that she may eventually absorb China and be ready with her intimate ally and close friend, England, for any emergency that may arise in any part of the world.

"THE TWO GREAT EMPIRES INSIST THAT AMERICA GUARANTEE THEIR POSSESSIONS.

"Not satisfied with their own power to retain that which the self-satisfied and temporary spokesman for America has permitted them to absorb, England and Japan are insisting through Clause X in the proposed league of nations that America shall guarantee for all time the present territorial integrity of the two remaining empires on earth.

"One little knows the fierce passion for democracy which burns in the breast of the average American if he thinks that such a scheme will ever succeed. For 143 years, America has been fighting with ever-increasing vigor the battle of democracy.

"America has ever been to the forefront in the struggle for human rights. She has sought to put an end in every way to the special privileges of the few. She favors the rights of the many and she will not now permit any man speaking for her to reverse her position, to destroy her old ideals, or to prevent her from carrying on the struggle until democracy shall finally triumph and the last stronghold of autocracy be destroyed.

"SHANTUNG A MONSTROUS ACT.

"The transfer of Shantung with its 40,000,000 people from the great young democracy of China to the absolutist Empire of Japan is a monstrous act, indefensible, high-handed, un-American. The attempt to have us guarantee the territorial integrity of England and Japan is a monstrous and a cowardly act, an attempt not alone to truckle to the strong but to trample upon and destroy the rights of the weak. It would make us a party to every act of tyranny that hereafter was perpetrated throughout the world.

"But history shows that even if it were possible for the great Senate of the United States to be false and recreant to its trust a thing like this could not be permanently done. It is asking us to do the impossible. All history teaches, all experience shows, that nothing is static in nature, that it is impossible for one generation to so impose its will on the world as to prevent a change in the boundaries of countries or in the fortunes of nations.

"THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS AND THE HOLY ALLIANCE.

"A century ago a 'holy alliance' undertook to do the very thing that is again being attempted to-day, but not only is the 'holy alliance' referred to nowadays by words of contempt and contumely, but the very governments which brought the treaty into existence are themselves but memories.

"The old or little men who for the moment from time to time control the destinies of mankind may think themselves able to stop the progress of mankind and impose their wills upon advancing generations. But history shows that even the few great outstanding figures in the history of the centuries were not able thus to act for the future. And the last half century, with its seven great empires thrown into the discard, shows how fate laughs at the puny efforts of man to govern the future or control its destinies.

"The world is just entering upon a great era of growth and reconstruction, yet this is the time when an old man, an older man, and a very old man in whose hands fate seemed for the moment to have whimsically placed the strings of the future, chose to abandon the high-sounding battle cries upon which the was was waged and won, and to make another ill-conceived and badly executed balance of power under the name of the league of nations.

"To do this, Clemenceau has tried to turn the wheels of time backward, tried to go back to the Europe of Louis XIV, breaking down the great peoples of the continent who outnumber and outbreed the French, and to set up, all over the continent, a series of buffer states that would prevent the growth of strong rivals to France, and leave her in the position of being the dominant military power of the continent.

"England, running true to form, is entirely contented for the moment to have France resume her old place among the nations, so long as she may see her economic rivals on the continent broken into bits and reduced to the position of impotence and poverty.

"England herself, true to her predatory instincts, seizes in the name of civilization and justice, territories almost continental in area, rich in mineral and other natural resources, to be added to her already immense empire. She emerges from the war not only the greatest empire in extent that the world has ever known, with a monopolistic control of articles essential to the comforts and conveniences of mankind, but, through her unquestioned control of the seas, she will strive for a practical monopoly of the commerce of the world.

"England emerges from the war with but one economic or industrial rival upon earth, these United States of America, whose public opinion she flatters herself that she controls and whose activities she at least has been able to guide so far as to make us forgive, if we did not forget, our previous experience with her.

"ENGLAND SEEKS TO FLATTER AMERICA.

"Tossing everything into the scales in the last great contest in which she broke, at least for generations to come, the continental industrial rivals which were ousting her from the markets of the world, England has won decisively and absolutely, as far as empire is concerned, and now looks with complacency upon the task before her of cajoling and flattering America.

"Meanwhile she carries on an economic war against us which will shut us out from the markets of the world, and which will gradually put us on the defensive in the fight that England is waging to recover the financial supremacy of the world, which she fondly believes we have but momentarily taken from her.

"One plea that she has made calls attention to her tremendous sacrifices in the contest which she keeps reminding us was fought for our safety as well as for her own interests, and which many of her spokesmen, like Sir Douglas Haig, now remind us, since she is no longer in danger, was won by her and not by us.

"England is shutting out the products of our manufacturers from her territories and, so far as possible, is shutting out our commerce in every corner of the globe and is depending upon her control of the seas to eventually shut us out from most of the foreign markets and leave us in the position where our manufacturers must be content to sell their products in so much of our own markets as England may choose to leave to us.

"This is in no sense an exaggeration of what she seeks and of what she hopes. She relies upon the skill of her diplomats to bring this state of affairs about. She has very largely monopolized rubber, wool, and other essential products of the world. She is seeking every day, with ever-increasing chances of success, to monopolize the oil fields of the world, while all the time, with sophisticated casuistry, she keeps, through a chorus of a thousand voices raised in the press, the pulpits, and the schools of America, assuring us that she alone in all the world is our constant friend, that but for her and her chivalrous, unselfish efforts we would have been overrun by some of the continental powers which were seeking this very world power which she now possesses to the full.

"She would have us believe that she fought unselfishly in the war for the very purposes for which our President says we entered the war, yet her first act after the war was won by us was to say that the doctrine of the freedom of the seas could not be even considered at Paris, and utterly unconsidered it was and still remains.

"She said she favored self-determination for all oppressed peoples and agreed with the President when he said that no people must live under a government not chosen by themselves. She must cynically smile to herself when she has the peace conference practically adjourn after having, with the help of that self-determination cloak, broken her rivals into pieces without any effort having been made to apply that doctrine to Ireland, to Egypt, to India, or to any of the other countries of which she is in possession with only the title that a robber has to his prey.

"ATTEMPTS TO MAKE OVER THE MAP OF THE WORLD IN THE DARK.

"She said she favored open covenants of peace, openly arrived at, and yet the 'holy alliance' did not attempt to make over the map of the world with the same secrecy behind which these three gentlemen hid themselves at Paris. And so one might go through all the points and find that English skill had escaped, or English cynicism had aroused mankind to have England, but these were in the way when an English peace had to be made.

"The Englishman has a genius for diplomacy. Not content with being saved from destruction, not content with unprecedented gains in territory, in wealth, in prestige throughout the world, he now seeks to undo what he regards as mistakes of the past and to recover by mental ability that which he lost a century and a half ago by force of arms. In his self-satisfaction he takes no account of the fact that the Thirteen Colonies, if they had continued as colonies, could not have begun to save him, as the forty-eight States did actually save him, as he himself must admit.

"ENGLAND AIMS TO UNDO THE WORK OF THE REVOLUTION.

"He wishes, now that his peril is for the moment past, to undo the work of the Revolution, to destroy the great experiment in government which the fathers set up upon these shores, and by one stroke set back the hands on the clock of time for centuries. He wishes to do this in order that the special form of privileged autocracy which governs England may regain control of this country, and with its mighty strength and unlimited resources bring about that junction of the English-speaking races which his agents like Carnegie and Rhodes have foretold and for which they have labored for two generations.

"He has hoped, because of his easy control of things at Paris, that he would find that the dead hand of Rhodes had actually won the victory. But he was astounded to find not alone the Senate of the United States standing like adamant against the proposed league of nations but the public sentiment of the people of America, aroused as never before, not only to defend American rights but to do what he complains of as an insolent thing—to interfere in 'domestic' problems of English politics.

"WASHINGTON STILL THE SEAT OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT.

"He is horrified to find that in spite of huge expenditures, that in spite of the British propaganda of Northcliffe, Parker, and others of that ilk, America refuses to be made again into a colony, and that interest in the freedom of the seas has been aroused in America as never before.

"He had been brought to believe during the pressure of the war that American public opinion was only the echo of English public opinion, and is astounded now to find that his complete victory at Paris is likely to be turned into complete defeat at Washington, where, in spite of his hopes to the contrary, and to his utter consternation, he finds the real seat of American government still continues to be found.

"THE REAL STRENGTH OF ENGLAND.

"England, while hastening to assure us in a hundred ways that she had no selfish interest to serve in asking to have the league of nations made operative and the integrity of the British Empire guaranteed by the power and resources of the United States, has unwittingly shown her own weakness. More and more thoughtful observers throughout the world are able to read in that demand the real opinion of English statesmen as to their own strength.

"As a flash of lightning in a storm enables the observer in a second to see his way through the darkness, so the request for such guarantee by Lord Cecil has revealed the real weakness of England, instead of the apparent strength which he and his group have been teaching us to observe.

"It is at once made clear that the England which must call on the world to guarantee its possessions is in a bad way both at home and abroad. It is an admission that it can no longer hope to call upon the strength of other countries in its hour of peril in order to preserve it, as it called the world into arms against France under Napoleon and against Germany under Wilhelm.

"In spite of its censorship the rumblings of industrial labor troubles with miners and transport workers and railway men are being heard in the land. The uprisings in India and in Egypt, the dissatisfaction in Australia and in Canada, and, above all, the settled determination upon the part of the people of Ireland to take at its face value the promises of Wilson, Clemenceau, Lloyd-George, and Orlando, and to insist upon absolute self-determination, are matters which are calling the attention of mankind to the fact that there is and there can be no freedom on earth while this distended and gigantic appetite called the British Empire continues to threaten and to prey upon mankind.

"AMERICA IS AT THE PARTING OF THE WAYS.

"The parting of the ways has come for America. Either we remain true to our ideals, true to the traditions of the past, still the moral leader of mankind and the hope of the oppressed people of the earth, or we join with the privileged class of England and become one of the predatory powers of the world.

"Either we continue to lead the forces of republicanism, whether they oppose the Central Empires of the Continent, the Czars of the Russias, or whether they stand against the Cecils and Balfours of England or the Mikado of Japan, and bring hope and cheer to the downtrodden people of Ireland, and we stand for the preservation of American rights or we join forces with Lloyd-George, that artful dodger of English politics, in his efforts to further deceive the people and put off until another generation the settlement of the question of Ireland. The question of Ireland, it must be remembered, can only be settled right when Ireland regains her independence and takes her place once more among the nations of the earth.

"Like everything else human, America can not remain static. America must either advance or retire. It must continue to lead the forces of democracy in its onward march to absolute freedom, or it must join the forces of autocracy and seek to snatch liberty from the other nations of the world.

"AMERICA IS ASKED TO ENTER INTO AN ENTANGLING ALLIANCE.

"We are asked now to abandon the advice given us by our first, and one of our greatest, Presidents against entering into entangling alliances with other powers. Not alone should we refuse to abandon this advice, but we should more than ever make clear to the world our unfaltering determination to abide by it and to make it one of the fundamental planks in our foreign policy. By standing by it in the past we have grown great and prosperous, masters of our own destinies, arbiters of our own fate.

"We have been free to enter wars and free to remain at peace, according to the exigencies of the hour and according to what we conceived to be our own interest and the best policy for the protection of the liberties of mankind. We have been free to govern our actions by the best light and information which we could obtain upon questions at the hour of action.

"Our liberty of action has not been foreclosed by reason of any commitment made in advance by those who had passed off the stage of action or were no longer in a position to speak for the majority of the people of our country. In other words, we have always been in the position of being governed by the living will of the present rather than by the dead hand of the past.

"Not alone every mandate of interest, but the high call of idealism should counsel us to remain in that position and not commit ourselves to any alliance which, obeying the passion and meeting the whim of the hour, could commit those who come after us to labors and sacrifices which they should not be asked to undertake except at their own free will and upon good cause shown to them at the hour of sacrifice.

"We are asked now to be satisfied with a declaration of the Monroe doctrine which, according to many thoughtful observers, weakens and jeopardizes rather than strengthens that cardinal principle of American diplomacy. In this hour when a peace conference, called into existence for the purpose of making peace, did not content itself with settling the questions at issue between the belligerents, but went up and down the world seeking problems it might settle, we should extend and strengthen, rather than weaken, the doctrine laid down by James Monroe.

"We should insist that the Western Hemisphere be not invaded by any power from the East; that no Old World possessions held here are to be increased, and we should also insist upon the absolute withdrawal from this territory of the flag of every empire or monarchy.

"THE BRITISH FLAG SHOULD BE COMPELLED TO FOLLOW THE OTHER FLAGS FROM OUR SHORES.

"What is sacrosanct about the British Empire that it continues to rule vast sections of the American Continent after all other empires have left its shores? The flag of Russia, of Spain, of Portugal, of Denmark have been withdrawn from this hemisphere. Why should we not now insist that the flag of England should follow the others and leave here in this hemisphere, dedicated for all time to liberty and republicanism, only the flags of the free?

"Why should not our great neighbor on the north, which Cecil undoubtedly hopes some day to use as a weapon to smite us, should the economic war now being waged between the countries ever reach the acute stage of military or naval warfare, or if there ever should come a conflict between England's ally, Japan, and ourselves—why should not that great country have an opportunity of taking its place among the republics of the earth, or even, if it chooses, of joining our country and thus bridging the gulf which separates us from our great Territory of Alaska?

"The ties which bind the people of Canada to us are every day increasing in number and in strength. The ties of trade which bind us are natural and are varied in form. The Great Lakes that lie between us are not intended to separate us, but should by a thousand ties of commerce draw us more closely together. Great numbers of our people come from the same racial stocks, and in the late war, according to reports coming from ever-increasing sources through our returned soldiers, our own soldiers found a dozen ways in which they resembled one another for every way in which either found that they resembled the British soldiers.

"CHAMBERLAIN HAS SAID THAT AN ADJOINING REPUBLIC IS A MENACE.

"Thoughtful observers in the United States as well as in Canada realize that our interests in the Western rather than in the Eastern Hemisphere, and that the views of an ever-increasing number of Canadians with relation to the future of Ireland, the future of Shantung, are those of a majority of the people of America rather than those of the governing body of England.

"The people of Canada are essentially a freedom-loving people, aside from what is pleased to call itself the governing class, which seeks for special privileges, like the same class in England. Canadians desire liberty for themselves and would like to see the blessings of liberty given to every people.

"More than that, if there be anything in the repeated declarations of Joseph Chamberlain in his attempts to justify the rubbing out of the two little republics of South Africa that republican institutions adjoining British territory were a menace to Britain, the governing class in England can look upon the continued existence of the American Republic only as a menace to England, and we have now the right to ask of her, having saved England, that as an evidence of her good faith in saying that she is a friend of liberty, that she withdraw her flag from this continent and leave it to be entirely dedicated to liberty and freedom.

"MAN IS SIGHING FOR PEACE.

"The late war aroused mankind to a realization of the fact that without regard to the boundaries of a country or the lines of race, war is a curse to mankind; that it takes not only millions of a generation to death and leaves other millions subject to sickness and disease as an aftermath, but it imposes on the future generations a back-breaking burden of taxation which means countless hardships and privations, while it brings only to the specially privileged peoples in every country immense fortunes which break down the foundations of liberty and sap the principles on which freedom exists.

"Without regard to race or religion, man is sighing for peace. He realizes that war is an abnormal condition, that peace is the normal condition, and men are seeking as they have never sought before, to insure a peace that will prevent and destroy war.

"HOPES BASED ON PEACE CONFERENCE VANISH LIKE A DREAM.

"Mankind lived in the hope that the peace conference was to be a setting for the ending of all wars. Peoples were to be taken from the thraldom of their aggressors, natural boundaries were to be established between States, armaments were to be destroyed, cannon were to be made into plowshares, and the 14 points of President Wilson were to be made the basis of an enduring peace.

"The peace conference has practically adjourned and all the hopes that were based upon it are passing into oblivion like the illusions of dreams. But the mass of mankind is more than ever insistent that there must be an end to human destruction and to the awful butchery and suffering that modern war spells for humanity. It has been driven into their minds that only by freedom to the oppressed of all nations can peace come, putting an end to the rule of the few and by bringing about government by the many, bringing at once liberty to man and an end to all war.

"There may be for a short time a brief respite for those who remain in power, though they have deceived the people who have seen promises solemnly made, lightly broken. But no just or permanent peace can be made until the purposes to which the American people set their hands when they entered the war have been attained, until autocracy in all its forms has been destroyed, until not alone the militarism that was breaking the back of Europe but the navalism which is oppressing and controlling the whole world shall be destroyed and the right of self-determination shall be given, not alone to some, but to all the peoples of the earth.

"A COURT OF NATIONS.

"A court of nations will come in its own due time that will embrace all the people of the earth, that will see to it that all peoples are free, and that will see to it that the World War will actually bring a permanent peace. Such a court will exalt justice and will destroy tyranny, but it will be a real court, open to all peoples, and not an unreal league which is only another name for an Anglo-American alliance, a Cecil-Smuts plan to exalt autocracy and enslave mankind.

"Every red-blooded man favors such a court of nations as he favors the brotherhood of man and the counsel of perfection, but the more intensely he favors such an ideal the more he objects to and abhors the hypocrisy which would steal the ideal in order to cover a treaty of alliance that would fasten the robber grip of England on all the world.

"THE GUARANTIES OF IRELAND.

"Having set forth the claims of Ireland to independence, her demand and her right to be free, having exposed the hypocrisy of England in her varied attempts to confuse the issue, having torn away the mask behind which England hoped to securely hide from the gaze of the world, let us see what Ireland offers to the world as an evidence of her good faith.

"The people of Ireland seek for themselves a form of government which would do justice to all the people within the four shores of Ireland. They seek to set up a government representing equality to all, injustice to none. They demand and will insist upon political equality and religious freedom for all the people of Ireland.

"They insist that the majority must rule, but that the rights of political equality and religious freedom shall be given to all members of the minority as well as of the majority.

"The people of Ireland believe that the minority is entitled to guaranties but not to control. They are ready to embody a guaranty of these rights in their constitution, as they have been embodied in the Constitution of the United States.

"They are ready to adopt these things which made for success in America and to avoid those things which were found to be mistakes or errors.

"CONTRASTS IRELAND AND AMERICA.

"As a result of the Revolution in America, estates were confiscated and men were exiled. The people of Ireland, however, are ready to say to the small group in Ulster who say they can not remain as an integral part of the Irish people that they would part with them with regret but will guarantee to them, if they choose to sell, the full market value of all property which they own in Ireland.

"The people of Ireland ask every man, of whatever blood or whatever religion, who is now in Ireland to remain in Ireland on terms which will insure absolute equality for all. They point out that there is no instance in its history of religious persecution or racial intolerance due to the majority of the people of Ireland; that wherever there has been persecution it has been by the minority, urged on against the majority by the English Government.

"The people of Ireland point out that in every section of the country, in every generation, Protestants of different sect or religious persuasions have been put forward as leaders by a majority of the Irish people, called to the highest elective office within the gift of the majority of the people. They urge that no fairer way of judging the future can be found than that furnished by the experiences of the past.

"They are willing at all times to accord to others the rights which they insist upon for themselves. They demand without further delay that their present rights shall be recognized by the world and that international recognition shall be given to the republican form of government established in Ireland after a plebiscite held on her shores last December in the presence of the great English army of occupation and under conditions which held the machinery of government at that time in the hands of Great Britain.

"All that any friend of Ireland asks of America is that present conditions in Ireland be studied fairly and dispassionately. In no other part of the world can there be found a parallel to the manner in which the population of Ireland has been reduced by the English Government within the past 70 years.

"Why should England, that cried out with such strength against injustice in Belgium, be permitted to maintain and continue her rule of might in Ireland? Even her apologists admit that England's rule in Ireland is based only upon her bayonets and cannon.

"How can England satisfy the conscience of the world with her explanation that what is wrong in Belgium and in Alsace is right in Ireland? She says that the people of Ireland should not cry out for liberty because, forsooth, they are to-day enjoying a larger measure of prosperity than they formerly had. Why should they not have it? Is it not the result only of their own thrift, their own industry, their own labors?

"The apologists of England say that Ireland did an immense business with that country last year—that this is a sufficient answer to Ireland's cry that she is badly governed! How typical was Clive of the English Government of all time when he said, after he had been accused of robbing India of immense treasure, that when he saw the wealth of the country he was astonished at his own moderation! England's statesmen feel that it is right to steal Irish sheep so long as they return a chop to the Irish owner.

"The proposition is an insult to the intelligence and conscience of the world, and in spite of the marvelous system of propaganda which the English diplomat has built up, he can not prevent the cry of Ireland for freedom from resounding in all parts of the world and coming back to plague him until it is satisfied by having justice done to Ireland.

"The English governing class are the Bourbons of modern days. They learn nothing, forget nothing. Let them beware lest the aroused public opinion of mankind shall sweep them as it swept their German and Russian cousins into oblivion and break into bits the British Empire, which is the last bulwark of autocracy against the onrushing tid of liberty and democracy."

Judge Daniel F. Cohalan, following the conclusion of his oral argument, by permission of the committee was authorized to have incorporated as a part of the testimony presented the following:

IRELAND'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE AND OTHER OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS, INCLUDING LETTERS TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE PEACE CONFERENCE AND THE GENERAL MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED IN SUPPORT OF IRELAND'S CLAIM FOR RECOGNITION AS A SOVEREIGN INDEPENDENT STATE.

IRELAND'S DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE—PROCLAIMED BY DAIL EIREANN, JANUARY 21, 1919.

[Translation.]

"Whereas the Irish people is by right a free people;

"And whereas for 700 years the Irish people has never ceased to repudiate and has repeatedly protested in arms against foreign usurpation;

"And whereas English rule in this country is, and has been, based upon force and fraud and maintained by military occupation against the declared will of the people;

"And whereas the Irish republic was proclaimed in Dublin on Easter Monday, 1916, by the Irish republican army, acting on behalf of the Irish people;

"And whereas the Irish people is resolved to secure and maintain its complete independence in order to promote the common weal, to reestablish justice, to provide for future defense, to insure peace at home and good will with all nations, and to constitute a national policy based upon the people's will, with equal right and equal opportunity for every citizen;

"And whereas at the threshhold of a new era in history the Irish electorate has in the general election of December, 1918, seized the first occasion to declare by an overwhelming majority its firm allegiance to the Irish republic:

"Now, therefore, we, the elected representatives of the ancient Irish people, in national parliament assembled, do, in the name of the Irish nation, ratify the establishment of the Irish republic, and pledge ourselves and our people to make this declaration effective by every means at our command.

"To ordain that the elected representative of the Irish people alone have power to make law binding on the people of Ireland, and that the Irish parliament is the only parliament to which that people will give its allegiance.

"We solemnly declare foreign government in Ireland to be an invasion of our national right, which we will never tolerate, and we demand the evacuation of our country by the English garrison;

"We claim for our national independencee the recognition and support of every free nation of the world, and we proclaim that independence to be a condition precedent to international peace hereafter;

"In the name of the Irish people we humbly commit our destiny to Almighty God, who gave our fathers the courage and determination to persevere through centuries of a ruthless tyranny, and strong in the justice of the cause which they have handed down to us, we ask His divine blessing on this, the last stage of the struggle which we have pledged ourselves to carry through to freedom.

IRELAND'S MESSAGE TO THE NATIONS.

[Translation.]

"To the nations of the world, greeting:

"The nation of Ireland, having proclaimed her national independence, calls, through her elected representatives in parliament assembled in the Irish capital on January 21, 1919, upon every free nation to support the Irish republic by recognizing Ireland's national status and her right to its vindication by the peace congress.

"Nationally, the race, the language, the customs, and traditions of Ireland are radically distinct from the English. Ireland is one of the most ancient nations of Europe, and she has preserved her national integrity vigorous and intact through seven centuries of foreign oppression; she has never relinquished her national rights, and throughout the long era of English usurpation she has in every generation defiantly proclaimed her inalienable right of nationhood down to her last glorious resort to arms in 1916.

"Internationally, Ireland is the gateway to the Atlantic. Ireland is the last outpost of Europe toward the west; Ireland is the point upon which great trade routes between east and west converge; her independence is demanded by the freedom of the seas; her great harbors must be open to all nations, instead of being the monopoly of England. To-day these harbors are empty and idle solely because English policy is determined to retain Ireland as a barren bulwark for English aggrandizement, and the unique geographical position of this island, far from being a benefit and safeguard to Europe and America, is subjected to the purposes of England's policy of world dominion.

"Ireland to-day reasserts her historic nationhood the more confidently before the new world emerging from the war, because she believes in freedom and justice as the fundamental principles of international law; because she believes in a frank cooperation between the peoples for equal rights against the vested privileges of ancient tyrannies, because the permanent peace of Europe can never be secured by perpetuating military dominion for the profit of empire, but only by establishing the control of government in every land upon the basis of the free will of a free people, and the existing state of war between Ireland and England can never be ended until Ireland is definitely evacuated by the armed forces of England.

"For these, among other reasons, Ireland—resolutely and irrevocably determined at the dawn of the promised era of self-determination and liberty, that she will suffer foreign dominion no longer—calls upon every free nation to uphold her national claim to complete independence as an Irish republic against the arrogant pretensions of England founded in fraud and sustained only by an overwhelming military occupation, and demands to be confronted publicly with England at the congress of nations, that the civilized world having judged between English wrong and Irish right may guarantee to Ireland its permanent support for the maintenance of her national independence.

IRELAND'S DEMOCRATIC PROGRAM—PROCLAIMED BY DAIL EIREANN.
[Translation.]

"We declare in the words of the Irish Republican Proclamation the right of the people of Ireland to the ownership of Ireland and to the unfettered control of Irish destinies to be indefeasible, and in the language of our first president, Padraic Pearse, we declare that the nation's sovereignty extends not only to all men and women of the nation, but to all its material possessions; the nation's soil and all its resources, all the wealth and all the wealth-producing processes within the nation; and with him we reaffirm that all rights to private property must be subordinated to the public right and welfare.

"We declare that we desire our country to be ruled in accordance with the principles of liberty, equality, and justice for all, which alone can secure permanence of government in the willing adhesion of the people.

"We affirm the duty of every man and woman to give allegiance and service to the commonwealth, and declare it is the duty of the nation to assure that every citizen shall have opportunity to spend his or her strength and faculties in the service of the people. In return for willing service, we, in the name of the republic, declare the right of every citizen to an adequate share of the product of the nation's labor.

"It shall be the first duty of the government of the republic to make provision for the physical, mental, and spiritual well-being of the children, to secure that no child shall suffer hunger or cold from lack of food or clothing or shelter, but that all shall be provided with the means and facilities requisite for their proper education and training as citizens of a free and Gaelic Ireland.

"The Irish republic fully realizes the necessity of abolishing the present odious, degrading, and foreign poor-law system, substituting therefor a sympathetic native scheme for the care of the nation's aged and infirm, who shall no longer be regarded as a burden, but rather entitled to the nation's gratitude and consideration. Likewise it shall be the duty of the republic to take measures that will safeguard the health of the people and insure the physical as well as the moral well-being of the nation.

"It shall be our duty to promote the development of the nation's resources, to increase the productivity of the soil, to exploit its mineral deposits, peat bogs, and fisheries, its waterways and harbors, in the interest and for the benefit of the Irish people.

"It shall be the duty of the republic to adopt all measures necessary for the re-creation and invigoration of our industries and to insure their being developed on the most beneficial and progressive cooperative industrial lines. With the adoption of an extensive Irish consular service, trade with foreign nations shall be revived on terms of mutual advantage and good will; while undertaking the organization of the nation's trade, import and export, it shall be the duty of the republic to prevent the shipment from Ireland of food and other necessaries until the wants of the Irish people are fully satisfied and the future provided for.

"It shall devolve upon the national government to seek the cooperation of the governments of other countries in determining a standard of social and industrial legislation with a view to a general and lasting improvement in the conditions under which the working classes live and labor.

LETTER FROM THE IRISH DELEGATES APPOINTED BY DAIL EIREANN TO PRESENT IRELAND'S CASE.

"MANSION HOUSE, DUBLIN, May 17, 1919.

"Monsieur CLEMENCEAU,
"President of the Peace Conference, Paris.

"SIR: The treaties now under discussion by the conference of Paris will, presumably, be signed by the British plenipotentiaries claiming to act on behalf of Ireland as well as Great Britain.

"Therefore we ask you to call the immediate attention of the peace conference to the warning which it is our duty to communicate, that the people of Ireland, through all its organic means of declaration, has repudiated and does now repudiate the claim of the British Government to speak or act on behalf of Ireland, and consequently no treaty or agreement entered into by the representatives of the British Government in virtue of that claim is or can be binding on the people of Ireland.

"The Irish people will scrupulously observe any treaty obligation to which they are legitimately committed; but the British delegates can not commit Ireland. The only signatures by which the Irish nation will be bound are those of its own delegates, deliberately chosen.

"We request you to notify the peace conference that we, the undersigned, have been appointed and authorized by the duly elected Government of Ireland to act on behalf of Ireland in the proceedings of the conference and to enter into agreements and sign treaties on behalf of Ireland.

"Accept, sir, the assurance of our great esteem.

"EAMON DE VALERA,
"ARTHUR GRIFFITH,
"GEORGE NOBLE COUNT PLUNKETT.

LETTER FROM THE IRISH DELEGATES APPOINTED BY DAIL EIREANN TO PRESENT IRELAND'S CAUSE.

"MANSION HOUSE, DUBLIN, May 26, 1919.

"Mons. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU,
"President of the Peace Conference, Paris.

"SIR: On May 17 we forwarded to you a note requesting you to warn the conference that the Irish people will not be bound by the signatures of English or British delegates to the conference, inasmuch as these delegates do not represent Ireland.

"We now further request that you will provide an opportunity for the consideration by the conference of Ireland's claim to be recognized as an independent sovereign state.

"We send you herewith a general memorandum on the case and beg to direct your attention in particular to the following:

"(1) That the rule of Ireland by England has been and is now intolerable; that it is contrary to all conceptions of liberty and justice, and as such, on the ground of humanity alone, should be ended by the conference.

"(2) That the declared object of the conference is to establish a lasting peace which is admittedly impossible if the legitimate claims of self-determination of nations such as Ireland be denied.

"(3) That incorporated with the peace treaty under consideration as a covenant establishing a league of nations intended, amongst other things, to confirm and perpetuate the political relationships and conditions established by the treaty. It is clear that it is radically unjust to seek to confirm and perpetuate what is essentially wrong, and that it is indefensible to refuse an examination of title when a confirmation of possession is intended such as that provided by the draft covenant of the league of nations.

"Ireland definitely denies that England or Britain can show any just claim or title to hold or possess Ireland and demands an opportunity for her representatives to appear before the conference to refute any such claim.

"We feel that these facts are sufficient basis to merit for our requests the consideration which we are sure you, sir, will give them.

"Please accept, Mr. President, the assurance of our great esteem.

"ARTHUR GRIFFITH,
"GEORGE NOBLE COUNT PLUNKETT.

LETTER FROM THE IRISH DELEGATES APPOINTED BY DAIL EIREANN TO PRESENT IRELAND'S CASE.

"MANSION HOUSE, DUBLIN, May 26, 1919.

"To the CHAIRMAN,
"Council of League of Nations, Paris.

"SIR: The Irish people share the view that a lasting peace can only be secured by a world league of nations pledged, when a clash of interests occurs, to use methods of conciliation and arbitration instead of those of force. They are consequently desirous that their nation should be included as a constituent member of such a league.

"Therefore, we, the delegates of the nation, chosen and duly authorized for the purpose by the elected national government of Ireland, desire to intimate through you that we are ready to take part in any conversations and discussions which may be necessary in order that the foundations of the league may be properly laid, and we ask the commission to provide us with an opportunity for doing so.

"Apart from the general grounds of right, the Irish nation has a special and peculiar interest in the league at present proposed.

"In the form in which the covenant is now drawn up it threatens to confirm Ireland in the slavery against which she has persistently struggled since the English first invaded her shores, and to pledge the rest of the civilized world, which has hitherto done us no wrong, to discountenance in future our just endeavors to free ourselves from the régime of implacable and brutal oppression under which we have suffered so long.

"Ireland is a distinct and separate nation with individual inalienable rights; which any league of nations founded on justice is bound to recognize.

"Accept, sir, the assurance of our great esteem.

"EAMON DE VALERA.

"GEORGE NOBLE COUNT PLUNKETT.

O'KELLY'S LETTER NO. 1 TO PREMIER CLEMENCEAU AND ALL THE PEACE CONFERENCE DELEGATES.

"PARIS, February 22, 1919.

"SIR: As the accredited envoy of the provisional government of the Irish republic, I have the honor to bring to your notice the claim of my government, in the name of the Irish nation, for the international recognition of the independence of Ireland, and for the admission of Ireland as a constituent member of the league of nations.

"The Irish people seized the opportunity of the general election of December, 1918, to declare unmistakably its national will; only in 26 (out of 105) constituencies of the country was England able to find enough "loyalists" to return members favorable to the union between Ireland and Great Britain; for the remaining 79 seats the electors chose as members men who believed in self-determination; of these, 73 who now represent an immense majority of the people went forward as republican candidates, and each of these republican members has pledged himself to assert by every means in his power the right of Ireland to the complete independence which she demands, under a national republican government, free from all English interferences.

"On the 21st of January, 1919, those of the republican members whom England had not yet cast into her prisons met in the Irish capital in a national assembly, to which, as the only Irish parliament de jure, they had summoned all Irish members of parliament; on the same day the national assembly unanimously voted the declaration of independence appended hereto and unanimously issued the message to the free nations, likewise appended.

"The national assembly has also caused a detailed statement of the case of Ireland to be drawn up; that statement will demonstrate that the right of Ireland to be considered a nation admits of no denial, and, moreover, that that right is inferior in no respect to that of the new States constituted in Europe and recognized since the war; three members, Eamon de Valera, Mr. Arthur Griffith, and Count Plunkett, have been delegated by the national assembly to present the statement to the peace congress and to the league of nations commission in the name of the Irish people.

"Accordingly I have the honor, sir, to beg you to be good enough to fix a date to receive the delegates above named, who are anxious for the earliest possible opportunity to establish formally and definitely before the peace conference and the league of nations commission now assembled in Paris Ireland's indisputable right to international recognition for her independence and the propriety of her claim to enter the league of nations as one of its constituent members.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"SEAN T. O'KELLY,
"Delegate of the Provisional Government
"of the Irish Republic.

O'KELLY'S LETTER—NO. 2.

"PARIS, March 31, 1919.

"To Premier Clemenceau and all the peace conference delegates.

"SIR: On behalf of the Irish nation, whose accredited representative I am, I beg to draw your attention, and through you the attention of the peace conference, to the following statement with regard to Ireland:

"Ireland is a nation which has exercised the right of self-determination in harmony with the principles formulated by President Wilson and accepted by the belligerents as the only sure foundation for a world peace. It is not only in the past that Ireland, generation after generation, has striven by force of arms as well as by all pacific means to regain her national freedom. At the general election last December the issue, and the only issue, placed before the Irish people was the independence of their country, and by a majority of more than three to one the representatives elected by the constitutional machinery of the ballot box are pledged to the abolition of English rule in Ireland. In none of the small nationalities with which the peace conference has hitherto occupied itself is the unanimity of the people so great; in none has the national desire for freedom been so great; in none has the desire for freedom been asserted so unmistakably and with so much emphasis. Following upon the general election, an Irish National Assembly has met; an Irish Republic has been constituted and proclaimed to the world; a President has been appointed, and with him ministers to direct different departments of state; a program of domestic policy has been issued; and an appeal has been addressed to the nations of the world to recognize the free Irish State that has thus been recalled to life. But while the national will has been declared and the mechanism of free government is ready, the former is being stifled and the latter paralyzed by England's ruthless exercise of military power. The President is a fugitive; the Irish Parliament is forced to conduct its business in secret; the most elementary civil rights are abrogated; the courts-martial are sitting at every center; and the gaols are filled with prisoners, victims of every brutality and indignity, whose only offense is that they have sought the freedom of their native land. It is in these circumstances that the Irish nation, through me, addresses the peace conference.

"Ireland manifestly comes within the scope of the principles that have been indorsed by the civilized nations, and it is for the application of these principles that the peace conference is now sitting. Ireland is weak; England is strong. Ireland in every possible way has asserted her right to freedom, which England, by sheer militarism, is intent now, as always in the past, to destroy. It is only by the exercise of tyrannical power that Ireland's right to freedom can be denied. It is to the great principle of national freedom, represented and embodied in the peace conference, that Ireland, exhausted by the cruelties of English rule, her population annihilated by one-half within living memory, her industries destroyed, her natural resources wasted, her civil liberties ended, her chosen leaders proscribed and treated as felons, now makes her appeal.

"Article 10 of the draft covenant of the league of nations is framed to secure national independence against the aggression of an external power. Its terms are as follows:

"'The high contracting powers undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league. In case of any aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the executive council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.'

"Ireland, as a nation that has declared its independence and is pledged to the principles of freedom, justice, and peace, desires to subscribe to the covenant of the league and to claim as against England the protection of article 10. I submit to the conference with profound respect that Ireland's claim is clear and can not with any shadow of justice be refused. Should it be rejected, the consequences would be as follows:

"1. Ireland henceforth must rely for her deliverance wholly upon her own efforts. No such rule has been laid down with regard to any other of the smaller nationalities whose emancipation has been made the care of the conference.

"2. Nations which never have denied the right of Ireland to freedom will deprive themselves for the future of the power of countenancing her claim, and will in consequence be bound, for the first time in history, to leave her unaided to her own resources as indicated in the preceding paragraph.

"3. Article 10 will impose upon all nations as a condition of membership of the league the obligation to guarantee to Great Britain a title to the possession of Ireland and dominion over the Irish people.

"Against the imposition of such slavery upon Ireland, and especially against the giving of such a guaranty of title to Great Britain, I enter on behalf of the people of Ireland, in whose name I have the honor to speak, the most emphatic protest.

"Great Britain's title to Ireland rests solely upon 'the military power of a nation to determine the fortunes of a people over whom they have no right to rule except the right of force.'

"The combined guaranty of such a title against the declared protest of Ireland would constitute a definite denial of 'the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether strong or weak,' and without the acceptance of that principle 'no part of the structure of international justice can stand.'

"The guaranty of such a title would be subversive of 'the reign of law based upon the consent of the governed and sustained by the organized opinion of mankind.'

"The guaranty of such a title would constitute recognition of the right of a strong power to serve its own material interest and advantage through the exercise of its 'exterior influence and mastery.'

"The guaranty of such a title would give Great Britain a warrant to make a nation weaker than herself 'subject to her purposes and interests.' It would confirm the claim of Great Britain to rule and dominate the people of Ireland 'even in her own internal affairs by arbitrary and irresponsible force.'

"Any guaranty under article 10 of territorial integrity and political independence as affecting Ireland can rightly inure only to the benefit of the people of Ireland themselves.

"In the name, therefore, of the people of Ireland I ask that the Irish nation may be invited to give their adhesion to the covenant of the league of nations, and that membership of the league—a membership available under article 7, even to colonies who have freely and legislatively subscribed to the supremacy of the English Imperial Parliament—shall not be denied to the government of a free, independent Irish Republic.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"SEAN T. O'KELLY,
"Delegate of the Provisional Government
"of the Irish Republic.

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF IRELAND'S CLAIM FOR RECOGNITION AS A SOVEREIGN INDEPENDENT STATE.

"Ireland is a nation not merely for the reason, which in the case of other countries has been taken as sufficient, that she has claimed at all times and still claims to be a nation, but also because, even though no claim were put forward on her behalf, history shows her to be a distinct nation from remotely ancient times.

"For over a thousand years Ireland possessed and duly exercised sovereign independence and was recognized through Europe as a distinct sovereign State.

"The usurpation of the foreigner has always been disputed and resisted by the mass of the Irish people.

"At various times since the coming of the English the Irish nation has exercised its sovereign rights as opportunity offered.

"The hope of recovering its full and permanent sovereignty has always been alive in the breasts of the Irish people and has been the inspiration and the mainspring of their political activities abroad as well as at home.

"English statecraft has long and persistently striven in vain to force the Irish people to abandon hope. The English policy of repression, spiritual and material, has ever been active from the first intrusion of English power until the present day.

"English policy has always aimed at keeping every new accretion of population from without separate from the rest of the nation and a cause of distraction and weakness in its midst.

"Nevertheless, the Irish nation has remained one, with a vigorous consciousness of its nationality, and has always succeeded sooner or later in assimilating to its unity every new element of the population.

"The Irish nation has never been intolerant toward its minorities and has never harbored the spirit of persecution. Such barbarities as punishment by torture, witch burning, capital punishment for minor offenses, etc., so frequent in the judicial systems of other countries, found no recognition in Irish law or custom. Twice in the seventeenth century—in 1642–1648 and in 1689—when, after periods of terrible persecution and deprivation of lands and liberty, the Irish people recovered for a time a dominant political power, they worked out in laws and treaties a policy of full religious equality for all dwellers in the island. On each occasion this policy of tolerance was reversed by the English power, which, on recovering its mastery, subjected the Irish race to further large confiscations of property, restrictions of liberty, and religious persecutions. More recently, notwithstanding the English policy of maintaining as complete a severance as possible, when Irish Protestants became attracted to the support of the national cause, the Catholics of Ireland accorded political leadership to a succession of Protestant leaders.

"The Irish have long been a thoroughly democratic people. Through their chosen leaders, from O'Connell to Parnell, they have provided the world with a model of democratic organization in opposition to the domination of privileged classes.

"If Ireland, on the grounds of national right and proved ability to maintain just government, is entitled to recover her sovereign independence—and that is her demand—the recognition of her right is due from other nations for the following reasons:

"(1) Because England's claim to withhold independence from Ireland is based on a principle which is a negation of national liberty and subversive of international peace and order. England resists Ireland's demand on the ground that the independence of Ireland would be, as alleged, incompatible with the security of England or of Great Britain or of the British Empire. Whether this contention is well or ill founded, if it is admitted, then any State is justified in suppressing the independence of any nation whose liberty that State declares to be incompatible with its own security. An endless prospect of future wars is the natural consequence.

"(2) Because England's government of Ireland has been at all times and is conspicuously at the present time an outrage on the conscience of mankind.

"Such a government, especially in its modern quasi-democratic form, is essentially vicious. Its character at the best is sufficiently described by a noted English writer, John Stuart Mill (Representative Government (1861), ch. 18): 'The Government by itself has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as government of one people by another does not and can not exist. One people may keep another as a warren or preserve for its own use, a place to make money in, a human cattle farm, to be worked for the profit of its own inhabitants. But if the good of the government is the proper business of a government it is utterly impossible that a people should directly attend to it.' Consequently the people of England devolve the power which they hold over Ireland upon a succession of satraps, military and civil, who are quite irresponsible and independent of any popular control, English or Irish, and represent no interest of the Irish people. Recent events show that the essential vices of the government are as active now as in former times.

"(3) Because the English temper toward the cause of Irish national liberty produces atrocious and intolerable results in Ireland. Among the results are a depopulation unexampled in any other country however badly governed; wholesale destruction of industries and commerce; overtaxation on an enormous scale; diversion of rents, savings, and surplus incomes from Ireland to England; opposition to the utilization by the Irish people of the economic resources of their country, and to economic development and social improvement; exploitation of Ireland for the benefit of English capitalists; fomentation of religious animosities; repression of the national culture; maintenance of a monstrous system of police rule, by which, in the words of an English minister, all Ireland is kept 'under the microscope'; perversion of justice by making political service and political subservience almost the sole qualification for judicial positions; by an elaborate corruption of the jury system by the organization of police espionage and perjury, and the encouragement of agents provocateurs, and recently and at present by using for the purpose of political oppression in Ireland the exceptional powers created for the purposes of the European war. Under these powers military government is established, some areas being treated as hostile territory occupied in ordinary warfare; a war censorship is maintained over the press and over publications generally; printing offices are invaded and dismantled; the police and military are empowered to confiscate the property of vendors of literature without any legal process; persons are imprisoned without trial and deported from Ireland; Irish regiments in the English Army are removed from Ireland, and a large military force, larger than at any previous time, with full equipment for modern warfare, has been maintained in Ireland; civilians are daily arrested and tried by courts-martial and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment.

"What are England's objections to Ireland's independence?

"The one objection in which English statesmen are sincere is that which has been already mentioned—that the domination of Ireland by England is necessary for the security of England. Ireland, according to the English Navy League, is 'the Helgoland of the Atlantic,' a naval outpost, to be governed for the sole benefit of its foreign masters. This claim, if it is valid, justifies not only the suppression of national liberty but also the weakening of Ireland by depopulation, repression of industry and commerce and culture, maintenanec of internal discord, etc. It can also be held to justify the subjugation of any small nation by a neighboring great power.

"The proximity of Ireland to England furnishes another plea. But Ireland is not as near to England as Belgium, Holland, Denmark, etc., are to Germany, Norway to Sweden, Portugal to Spain. In fact, it is this very proximity that makes independence necessary for Ireland as the only condition of security against the sacrifice of Irish rights to English interests.

"A further plea is that England, being a martime power, her safety depending on her navy and her prosperity depending on maritime commerce, the domination of Ireland is for her a practical necessity—a plea involving that Ireland's natural harbors, the best in Europe, must be kept empty of mercantile shipping, except for such shipping as carries on the restricted trade between Great Britain and Ireland.

"Ireland can not admit that the interests of one country, be they what they may, can be allowed to annul the natural rights of another country. If England's plea be admitted, then there is an end to national rights, and all the world must prepare to submit to armed interests or to make war against them.

"We may expect also to find the plea insinuated, in some specious form if not definitely and clearly made, that the English rule in Ireland has been and is favorable to the peace, progress, and civilization of Ireland. We answer that, on the contrary, English rule has never been for the benefit of Ireland and has never been intended for the benefit of Ireland; that it has isolated Ireland from Europe, prevented her development, and done everything in its power to deprive her of a national civilization. So far as Ireland at present is lacking in internal peace, is behind other countries in education and material progress, is unable to contribute notably to the common civilization of mankind, these defects are the visible consequences of English intrusion and domination.

"The Irish people have never believed in the sincerity of the public declarations of English statesmen in regard to their 'war aims,' except in so far as those declarations avowed England's part in the war to have been undertaken for England's particular and imperial interests. They have never believed that England went to war for the sake of France or Belgium or Serbia, or for the protection or liberation of small nationalists, or to make right prevail against armed might. If English statesmen wish to be regarded as sincere they can prove it to the world by abandoning, not in words but in act, the claim to subordinate Ireland's liberty to England's security.

"Ireland's complete liberation must follow upon the application of President Wilson's principles. It has not resulted from the verbal acceptance of those principles; and their rejection is implied in the refusal to recognize for Ireland the right of self-determination. Among the principles declared by the President, before and since America entered the war, accepted by the American people, and adopted by the spokesmen of the chief allied powers, we cite the following:

"'No peace can rest securely on political or economic restrictions meant to benefit some nations and cripple or embarrass others.' 'Peace should rest upon the rights of peoples, not on the rights of governments—the rights of peoples, great and small, weak or powerful; their equal right to freedom and security and self-government, and to participation, upon fair terms, in the economic opportunities of the world.' 'What we demand in this war is nothing peculiar to ourselves. It is that the world be made fit and safe to live in, and particularly that it be made safe for every peace-loving nation, which, like our own, wishes to live its own life, determine its own institutions, be assured of justice and fair dealing by other peoples of the world, as against force and selfish aggression.' 'An evident principle runs through the whole of the program I have outlined. It is the principle of justice to all peoples and nationalities, and their right to live on equal terms of liberty and safety with one another, whether they be strong or weak. Unless this principle be made the foundation, no part of the structure of international justice can stand.'

"Speaking on behalf of the American people at New York on the 27th of September, 1918, President Wilson said:

"'We accepted the issues of the war as facts, not as any group of men either here or elsewhere had defined them, and we can accept no outcome which does not squarely meet and settle them. These issues are these: "Shall the military power of any nation or group of nations be suffered to determine the fortunes of peoples over whom they have no right to rule, except the right of force?" "Shall strong nations be free to wrong weak nations and make them subject to their purpose and interest?" "Shall peoples be ruled and dominated, even in their own internal affairs, by arbitrary and irresponsible force, or by their own will and choice?" "Shall there be a common standard of right and privilege for all peoples and nations, or shall the strong do as they will, and the weak suffer without redress?" "Shall the assertion of right be haphazard and by casual alliance, or shall there be a common concert to oblige the observance of common rights?" No man, no group of men, chose these to be the issues of the struggle. They are the issues of it, and they must be settled—by no arrangement or compromise or adjustment of interests, but definitely and once for all, and with a full and unequivocal acceptance of the principle that the interest of the weakest is as safe as the interest of the strongest. * * * The impartial justice meted out must involve no discrimination between those to whom we wish to be just and those to whom we do not wish to be just. It must be a justice that plays no favorites and knows no standards but the equal rights of the several peoples concerned.'

"If England objects to the application of those principles to the settlement of the ancient quarrel between herself and Ireland, she thereby testifies: (1) That her international policy is entirely based on her own selfish interest, not on the recognition of rights in others, notwithstanding any professions to the contrary; (2) that in her future dealings with other nations she may be expected, when the opportunity arises, to use her power in order to make her own interest prevail over their rights; (3) that her particular object in keeping possession of Ireland is to secure naval and mercantile domination over the seas, and in particular over the North Atlantic and the nations which have legitimate maritime interests therein, ruling Ireland at the same time on a plan of thoroughgoing exploitation for her own sole profit, to the great material detriment of Ireland, and preventing the establishment of beneficial intercourse, through commerce and otherwise, between Ireland and other countries.

"It is evident that while Ireland is denied the right to choose freely and establish that form of government which the Irish people desire, no international order can be founded on the basis of national right and international justice; the claim of the stronger to dominate the weaker will once more be successfully asserted; and there will be no true peace.

"It must be recognized that Ireland has already clearly demonstrated her will. At the recent general election, out of 105 constituencies 73 returned republican candidates and 6 returned representatives who, though not republicans, will not oppose the free exercise of self-determination by the Irish people. Nor is there the slightest likelihood that this right will at any time be relinquished.

"The Irish people are thoroughly capable of taking immediate charge of their national and international affairs, not less capable than any of the new States which have been recognized since the beginning of the war or which are about to be recognized, and by a procedure not less valid than has been held good for other restored or newly established States they have already formally constituted a national government.

"The effect on the world of the restoration of Ireland to the society of free nations can not fail to be beneficial. On the part of the nations in general this fact will be a guaranty of the new international order and a reassurance to all the smaller nations. On the part of England, if justice to Ireland be not 'denied or sold or delayed,' the fact will be an earnest to other peoples, especially to those whose commerce is borne upon the Atlantic Ocean, that England's naval power is not hostile to the rights and legitimate interests of other countries.

"Ireland's voice in the councils of the nations will be wholly in favor of peace and justice. Ireland covets no possessions and makes no territorial claims outside of her own well-defined geographical bounds. Her liberty can not infringe on that of any other people. She will not make any war or aggression or favor any. In remembrance of her unexampled progress and prosperity during a brief period of legislative but not executive independence (1782–1798), she looks forward to the time when she will again be free to contribute to the prosperity of all countries in commercial relation with her.

"The longest agony suffered by any people in history will be ended, the oldest standing enmity between two peoples will be removed. England will be relieved of the disgrace she bears in the eyes of all peoples, a disgrace not less evident to the remote Armenian than to her nearest continental neighbors.

"In proportion as England gives earnest of disinterestedness and good will in like proportion shall Ireland show her readiness to join in with England in allowing the past to pass into history. The international ambition of Ireland will be to recreate in some new way that period of her ancient independence of which she is proudest, when she gave freely of her greatest treasures to every nation within her reach and entertained no thought of recompense or of selfish advantage."

Judge COHALAN. Mr. Chairman, I have the pleasure of presenting to the committee Hon. Frank P. Walsh, who went over to the other side as the chairman of the American mission on Irish independence. He appeared before the Paris peace conference with his colleagues, Mr. Ryan, of Philadelphia, and Gov. Dunne, of Illinois, for the purpose of appearing there on behalf of the chosen representatives of Ireland, President De Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count Plunkett. The committee may remember that he was, with President Taft, the former joint chairman of the War Labor Board. I have great pleasure in presenting to you Hon. Frank P. Walsh.

STATEMENT OF MR. FRANK P. WALSH.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, to my mind the issue that is before the Senate and to which I have the privilege of addressing myself this morning, transcends in importance any issue that has ever been presented to us in our history of nationhood. I do not except from that the great issues that brought on the conflict between our own people, the question of nullification, the question of black slavery, and the question of the right of secession, because I see in what is going on here a situation of menace to us as a Nation—not as a power, but integral as a Nation—such as we have never been confronted with before.

It was conceivable to the minds of the men who wrote our Constitution that a situation might arise whereby a dictatorship might be asserted in this country by some person who had secured the favor of the people through the processes laid down in the Constitution of the United States. It was conceivable to them that men might be weakened by flattery, that they might be carried away by power and that, perhaps, especially in dealing with other nations of different beliefs and different concepts, they might wander away from the principles laid down in the Constitution of the United States. And so I am profoundly thankful, and I say that on behalf of those whom I represent, that this Senate committee has given us a hearing to-day. I am distressed to observe that there is not a fuller attendance of Senators, and yet I feel that I should go on with what I have to say notwithstanding, in the hope that as my mind was brought to where I am to-day, perhaps the minds of some of my fellow Democrats may be so brought, and that we may be preserved from the calamity which I believe is about to overtake us, if it be not checked by the Senate. Our forefathers, with that in mind, provided specifically against one-man power in the dealing with other nations. They provided that the President of the United States had authority to make treaties only with the advice and consent of the Senate, and then only when two-thirds of those present concurred in the treaty. It is our hold, our democratic hold, on the Constitution of the United States that I believe is going to save us and save more than one-half of the world from being plunged into wars such as have not been comparable in our history before, and which will occur under any such proposition. We have now more than one-half of the world in open rebellion against the other half asserting repressive power, among which would be under the present league of nations the Congress of the United States. So the people of the world have been looking to this Constitution, understanding its strength and elasticity, and looking to the Senate to save them from what they think will be the most calamitous event in the history of the world.

Might I, without being thought to put a personal angle on what I have to say, describe as briefly as I may how I am brought to this conclusion, which I urge upon you. Although I am but one humble citizen of this country, in appearing before you gentlemen to plead the cause I do, I do so with a feeling of solemnity which I have never before felt in any presence in my life. Perhaps what I say about myself may in a small way reflect an angle on the public mind, and it might give your committee perhaps some sort of idea if I can make myself plain, of what goes to make up the composite mind. Prior to our entry into this war I might have been described as a pacifist. I know that this finally in its last analysis will not be a political question. I know that when this matter is settled it is going to be settled by honorable men from motives of the loftiest patriotism. Our reactions may first be excused, primarily and initially, for running along party lines, because we are a party Government, but in great questions, we stand together. That is evidenced by the support that the gentlemen in whose presence I have the honor to speak gave the President of the United States, a member of my party, during the dark days when he needed support in the bitter conflict which cost us so many precious lives and billions of dollars of our treasure. I say this because I have always been a Democrat, and I like to call myself an independent Democrat, and I have supported every Democratic President since I reached my majority. Prior to our entry into this war I was a believer in peace to the point of being called a pacifist.

I believe I did think that I was a pacifist, but when brought face to face with these questions I found, as we all found, that there are so many things that we would fight for, there are so many things that if physically brave enough we would die for, that the pacifist so called, in this country was a negligible quantity. But I did have that point of view to an extent that I was led to make something like 78 speeches on the theme which the President of the United States gave to us, that he kept us out of war, and I want to say to you that throughout this land there was a great response to that thought. On account of certain connections I have had in an official way—I suppose for that reason—I was sent through the great Hocking Valley of Ohio and Pennsylvania, the coal valley, and practically with unanimity the people in that section responded to the thought that we were traditionally opposed to war, that we were historically opposed to entangling ourselves with any European embroilment and entanglements. But our country saw fit, through the regular processes, to declare war, and I say that I speak the composite mind of the people who despise war in this country when I say that they sprang to the support of the Government because under the written Constitution laid down by our forefathers they agreed in honor to do so. They knew, the intelligent ones of them, that when war was declared by this country the President of the United States became the most powerful potentate upon the face of the earth. They knew or thought they knew that he needed less legislation in the freest country in the world to perform what was at his hand, namely, to provide the means and opportunity for winning the war, than did any man on the face of the earth, including the late Emperor of Germany; and we did it purposely, gentlemen of the committee—I believe our forefathers did—because it was thought at that time that a democracy, a government founded upon republican principles, could not stand against an autocracy where one man had autocratic power, so it was provided, and wisely provided, that along the paths of peace we should proceed as a democracy, but that when war was declared we wanted all of the power, all of the drive, all of the concentration that the most powerful potentate on the face of the earth might have at that time.

So that we went into it without question. I believe that nothing that was done by any man in this war was a sacrifice. I stood among the 2,200 graves of those American citizens at the edge of Belleau Wood, with practically every name on every cross showing the boy or the man was of Irish or German origin, because there were many German names on those crosses, and I knew that even they, fighting in this spirit as they did, would not say, if their voiceless lips could speak, that they had made any sacrifice. They did it willingly, cheerfully, for the confederation of human beings that got together more than 150 years ago to declare that this was one Government that would never foster tyranny; that it was one Government that would always remain the refuge of the principles of right, and that when it was threatened or that when its representatives thought it was threatened, their answer could be but one thing—to give up all they had, even life, for this Government.

I had the privilege to serve my Government for about a year, or over a year, in a capacity that brought me quite in touch with what might be called the masses of the people of this country. Considering industrial disputes involving something over 3,000,000 people, I saw that that same spirit existed among the working people, what we are pleased to call the masses, the common people of this country, and that that same intelligent thought, even though perhaps they could not define a section of the Constitution, actuated them, that same spirit and genius, so that they were just like the soldier who went abroad. Therefore, when we threw the weight of our great resources and our man power into the conflict, we obtained the results we did. I use the words "man power" as I do, although I despise the words, because I know that man power is talked about by the Governments of Europe as meaning only the skull and the brains of such as my boy who sits yonder. It means the disemboweling of the human beings; it means throwing men and women to their death by the words usually of one or two men. But that was the name they gave to it, and so I use it. We threw into the conflict the man power of this country and the matchless resources that won this war. I say that, gentlemen of the committee, not because strategically our soldiers made a fight that kept the enemy from Paris, not because with a dash that at least was as great as that of the most seasoned soldiers, they won a battle at certain points and turned the tide. I do not mean that, but I mean that when we threw in our mighty resources that war was won. We have enough gained to pay off the war in one year's productivity. We have enough now, according to Government figures, to pay the whole cost of the war in the increased value of our productivity since 1914; so that if a country marches on its stomach and wins by the last pound of wheat or the last pound of meat, when we went in, we won this war.

In addition to being opposed to war—and I want to say that my opposition was strengthened by walking through those devastated fields in France—I want to add one other thought. No man could see the bleaching bones of his own kindred, no man could look at those rough brogans still with the flesh and blood in them of the living men who walked in them a few months ago, and not despise war with all his heart. I was a believer likewise in a league of nations. I profoundly believed in a league of nations. I took my conception of a league of nations from what our great President has said, and I want to say at this moment again, according him very great respect for his great ability and for the work that he has done for this country up until this time, that the best friend that he has in the United States is the man who will stand up and preserve him from the wreck of the great mistake that he seems about to make after coming from Paris.

I followed his concept, and I was and am in favor of that much-talked-of thing, a league of nations, a league of nations that will let every nation upon the earth take part in it, to begin with national disarmament, the absolute freedom of the seas, and the much-talked-of open covenants openly arrived at, and the abolition of secret treaties. It was not an ideal thing. I say that it was the whole basis of any league of nations that would prove effective. It was the parting of the ways between secret diplomacy, and open covenants that a free people could understand and act upon intelligently, as I know you are trying to act upon this question to-day. I believed that such a league of nations was possible, and I so abhorred war that I gave what strength I had to the formation of such a league. Having been a humble member of the League to Enforce Peace, after the armistice was signed I accepted a position upon the executive committee of that body, and took part in the nation-wide tour for a league of nations.

Senator BORAH. Did you travel with Mr. Taft for a while?

Mr. WALSH. I did. I traveled as far as Chicago with him. From there I went to St. Louis and he went in another direction, and I will say that I was in accord with Mr. Taft and Dr. Lowell and others who spoke with him upon this general proposition, and I believe at heart if I understand them I am in accord with them to-day; and perhaps if I can get to it as I hurry through I may show the point of departure, and hope that the rest of them will depart at the same point. [Applause.]

It was thrown in my way to go to Paris. I might say here, although it is nothing to be proud of or to be ashamed of, that I have not given as much attention to the so-called Irish question that formerly existed as some of these gentlemen have who appear with me here to-day. I was not a member of any society that had for its object help to Ireland, but I was called into this by the gentlemen who organized the Irish race convention. My ancestry was Irish, every bit of it. This appeals to me as an American proposition. It occurred to me that if the case of Ireland so splendidly described by the President of the United States could be given to the world, if it could be understood that that was what we fought for, the greatest advance could be made by our country, and the greatest evidence could be given of our entire good faith in this enormous and awesome enterprise upon which we had entered, so that I went in as the representative and as the chairman of the committee of the American commission on Irish independence from the Irish race convention. We have here, gentlemen of the committee, and have given you a copy of, all the correspondence that we had with all persons while in Paris. We have given you a splendid copy of the report on conditions in Ireland. We have addressed a letter to your honorable chairman, a copy of which is on the first page of the brown-covered pamphlet in which we have embodied this correspondence. In addition to that we had interviews with every member of the American commission to negotiate peace. Some of them we believe to be very significant, and we wanted to give the full text of those interviews in an executive session of this committee, because I believed there were matters in it that ought not to be made public, that would be embarrassing to some gentlemen if they were made public, but we will offer them to an executive meeting of this committee or to the Senate of the United States, if called upon.

Senator MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I move that these communications be received and printed as a confidential committee document.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. WALSH. We were sent to Paris and we went there with the commission of the 5,132 men and women, with this idea.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Just a moment, Mr. Walsh.

The CHAIRMAN. The Senator from California.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I want to suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that the hearings of this committee have all been open. We have endeavored to make a departure from the rules that have prevailed heretofore, and to act in the open; to observe one of the 14 points, that of open covenants of peace openly arrived at.

I think these communications, if printed, ought to be open to the public as well as to the United States Senate. [Applause.] I want to amend the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] or to substitute for it the motion that the communications be received, be accepted, and be printed as a part of our record of the proceedings.

Senator MOSES. I accept that substitute, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Senator BORAH. What are these communications?

Mr. WALSH. The communications are the interviews which we had with the members of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, including the President.

Senator FALL. Mr. Chairman, this commission waited upon the President of the United States and there declined to receive from him any confidential information which they could not impart to the people of the United States. If the committee could not conscientiously receive information of that character from the President of the United States—and I was one who would not have attended the conference had it not been open, I must decline—and I had intended to so state later—to keep anything confidential from the people of the United States which it is their business to know.

Senator SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I submit that this matter ought to come later, because it was understood that we would have nothing but hearings this morning.

Senator FALL. This is a part of the hearing, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion for the printing of these documents.

Senator FALL. That will leave them at liberty to present them under those conditions, if they desire to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. If they are submitted, I think they ought to be published as a part of the record.

Senator FALL. I simply wanted to serve notice that I would not regard the information as confidential if it was submitted.

Senator KNOX. Put the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall these documents referred to by Mr. Walsh be printed as a part of the record, as submitted by him.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

(The documents referred to are as follows:)

CORRESPONDENCE IN CASE OF IRELAND'S CLAIM FOR INDEPENDENCE BETWEEN AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE, AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE, AND REPRESENTATIVES OF OTHER GOVERNMENTS.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
OFFICE OF CHAIRMAN,
2142 Woolworth Building, August 26, 1919.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We beg to hand you herewith, for consideration of your honorable committee, copies of all correspondence between the American Commission on Irish Independence, the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, and the representatives of other Governments, at Paris, between the dates of April 16, 1919, and June 27, 1919, inclusive.

We likewise beg leave to inform your honorable body that, in addition to this correspondence, we had personal interviews with all of the members of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace.

Immediately at the close of such interviews, the substance of the same were dictated to stenographers, and full transcripts of the important ones preserved.

On account of the subject matter of certain of them, we do not consider it proper to offer the same at a public hearing. If your honorable body desires the information, however, we shall be glad to submit the full text of the interviews to you in executive session.

With assurance of our high respect and esteem, we are,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman,
MICHAEL J. RYAN,
EDWARD F. DUNNE.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Hotel Grand, Paris, France, April 16, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We beg to advise you that in pursuance of the commission given us by the Irish race convention held in the city of Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, we were, among other things, instructed to obtain, if possible, for the delegates selected by the people of Ireland, a hearing at the peace conference.

The delegates so selected are Messrs. Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count Plunkett.

If these gentlemen were furnished safe conduct to Paris so that they might present their case, we feel that our mission would be, in the main if not entirely, accomplished.

May we therefore ask you to obtain from Mr. Lloyd-George, or whomsoever may be intrusted with the specific details of such matters by the English Government, safe conduct for Messrs. de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett from Dublin to Paris.

If you could see your way clear to do this, we feel sure that it would meet with the grateful appreciation of many millions of our fellow citizens, would certainly facilitate the object of our mission, and place us under additional great and lasting obligation to you.

It would afford us the utmost pleasure to call upon you in person in order that we might pay our respects as well as make a brief suggestion as to the subject matter of this letter, provided such course meets with your approval and convenience.

With assurances of our continued high consideration and esteem, as always,

Sincerely, yours,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
MICHAEL J. RYAN.
EDWARD F. DUNNE.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Grand Hotel, Paris, April 17, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. WALSH: The President asks me to say, in reply to your recent letter that he would be very glad to see you at his residence, 11 Place des Etats Unis, at 5.30 o'clock this afternoon, Thursday.

Sincerely, yours,

GILBERT F. CLOSE,
Confidential Secretary to the President.

Mr. FRANK P. WALSH,
Grand Hotel, Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Grand Hotel, Paris, May 17, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State and American Commissioner to Negotiate Peace.

SIR: On behalf of and representing the Irish race convention held in Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, we very respectfully request your good offices to procure from the British Government a safe conduct from Dublin to Paris and return for Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett, the elected representatives of the people of Ireland, so that they may in person present the claims of Ireland for international recognition as a republic to the peace conference.

As you know, the British Government assented to our going to Ireland; we went there for the purpose of conferring with the representatives of the Irish people and ascertaining for ourselves at first hand the conditions prevailing in that country. We have returned therefrom and are now more desirous than ever that the authorized representatives of Ireland shall be given the opportunity to appear and present the case of that country to the representatives of the assembled nations.

Awaiting the favor of an early reply, we remain,

Very truly, yours,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
EDWARD F. DUNNE.
MICHAEL J. RYAN.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Suite 760, Grand Hotel, Paris, May 20, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Following the interview courteously accorded by you to the chairman of our delegation on the 17th ultimo, Col. House made the following request of Mr. Lloyd-George:

"That safe conduct be given by the Government of Great Britain from Dublin to Paris and return for Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett, the representatives selected by the people of Ireland to present its case to the peace conference."

Upon the day following Col. House conveyed the information to us that Mr. Lloyd-George was willing to comply with such request, but desired an interview with the American delegates before doing so, and that it was the desire of Mr. Lloyd-George that arrangements for the meeting with him be made through Mr. Philip Kerr, private secretary to Mr. Lloyd-George.

After two tentative dates had been set by Mr. Kerr for the meeting with Mr. Lloyd-George, and not yet having met him, we were advised by Col. House to repeat our original request in writing to the honorable Secretary of State, Mr. Robert Lansing, which we did upon the 17th instant.

At this moment we have been informed by the private secretary of Mr. Secretary Lansing that our request has been referred to you.

May we not therefore respectfully ask of you that the undersigned, our full delegation, be given an opportunity to present to you in person, in as brief manner as consistent with the importance of the case, suggestions which Messrs. de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett, the representatives aforesaid, have asked us to convey to you, together with certain facts of grave import now in our possession?

May we also take the liberty of suggesting, in view of existing conditions in Ireland (which can not and will not be denied), that to foreclose its case by refusing a hearing to its representatives at this time would be disconsonant with the declared purpose for which the war was prosecuted and out of harmony with the common principles of democracy?

We would gratefully appreciate a response at your convenience, and with assurances of our continued high regard.

Sincerely,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Paris, May 21, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. WALSH: The President asks me to acknowledge the receipt of the letter of May 20 signed by yourself, Gov. Dunne, and Mr. Ryan and to say that he has taken the matter up with the Secretary of State, and that, by the President's direction, Mr. Lansing will reply to it.

Sincerely, yours,

GILBERT F. CLOSE,
Confidential Secretary to the President.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Grand Hotel, Paris, May 22, 1919.

The original of the following letter was to-day handed to M. Clemenceau's secretary at the foreign office, Quai d'Orsay, Paris, by Sean T. O'Ceallaigh, envoy of the Irish republican government at Paris, and copies were handed personally by Mr. Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the American Commission on Irish Independence, to President Wilson, Col. House, Secretary of State Lansing, Mr. White, and Gen. Bliss, the members of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace:

"MANSION HOUSE, Dublin, May 17, 1919.

"To M. CLEMENCEAU,
"President of the Peace Conference of Paris.

"SIR: The treaties now under discussion by the conference of Paris will, presumably, be signed by the British plenipotentiaries claiming to act on behalf of Ireland as well as of Great Britain.

"Therefore we must ask you to call the immediate attention of the peace conference to the warning which it is our duty to communicate, that the people of Ireland, through all its organic means of declaration, has repudiated and does now repudiate the claim of the British Government to speak or act on behalf of Ireland, and consequently that no treaty or agreement entered into by the representatives of the British Government in virtue of that claim is or can be binding on the people of Ireland.

"The Irish people will scrupulously observe any treaty obligation to which they are legitimately committed; but the British delegates can not commit Ireland. The only signatures by which the Irish nation will be bound are those of its own delegates deliberately chosen.

"We request you to notify the peace conference that we, the undersigned, have been appointed and authorized by the duly elected national government of Ireland to act on behalf of Ireland in the proceedings of the conference and to enter into agreements and sign treaties on behalf of Ireland.

"Accept, sir, the assurance of our high esteem.

At the suggestion of President de Valera, we desire to call the same to your attention. We trust that the justice of the demand from the standpoint of democracy as well as of fundamental human rights, may lead you to throw the weight of your influence in its favor.

COMMISSIONER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Paris, May 22, 1919.

DEAR MR. WALSH: I have duly received the letter dated the 22d which you have been so good as to write me.

Yours, sincerely,

(Signed) HENRY WHITE.

Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,
Grand Hotel, Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Hotel de Crillon, Paris, May 24, 1919.

SIR: I have received the letter which you and Messrs. Dunne and Ryan addressed to me on May 16 regarding the issuing of safe conducts by the British Government to Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett, in order that they may proceed from Ireland to France and return, and I immediately took steps to acquaint myself with the facts of the case, which transpired before the matter was brought to my attention by your above-mentioned letter.

I am informed that when the question of approaching the British authorities with a view to procuring the safe conducts in question was first considered every effort was made, in an informal way, to bring you into friendly touch with the British representatives here, although owing to the nature of the case it was not possible to treat the matter officially. The British authorities having consented that you and your colleagues should visit England and Ireland, although your passports were only good for France, every facility was given to you to make the journey. Before your return to Paris, however, reports were received of certain utterances made by you and your colleagues during your visit to Ireland. These utterances, whatever they may have been, gave, as I am informed, the deepest offense to those persons with whom you were seeking to deal, and consequently it seemed useless to make any further effort in connection with the request which you desired to make. In view of the situation thus created, I regret to inform you that the American representatives feel that any further efforts on their part connected with this matter would be futile and therefore unwise.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

ROBERT LANSING.

Hon. FRANK P. WALSH,
Grand Hotel, Paris.

NOTE.—This letter was received subsequent to the dispatch of our letter of May 26, 1919.

—

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Grand Hotel, Paris, May 26, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State and American Commissioner
to Negotiate Peace, Paris.

SIR: Upon the 17th instant we had the honor to hand to your private secretary, for immediate transmission to you, a letter requesting your good offices to procure from the British Government safe conduct from Dublin to Paris and return for Hons. Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett, representatives of the people of Ireland, copy of which letter we inclose to you herewith.

Upon the day following we were advised by the American press representatives that you had communicated to them the fact that you had referred the letter to the President of the United States. Later in the day this statement was confirmed by your secretary in an interview with our chairman.

With this information, upon the 20th instant we addressed a letter of the same purport to the President of the United States, and requesting a hearing by him. We also inclose copy of this letter to you herewith.

Upon the 21st instant we were advised by Mr. Gilbert F. Close, confidential secretary to the President, that at the President's direction you would make reply to such letter. We have not been advised of further action, if any, either by yourself or the President, upon our request.

In view of the urgency and importance of the matter, the arrangements which must necessarily be made by President de Valera and his associates as an outcome of your reply, as well as the further steps which we may be called upon to take in an endeavor to accomplish the objects of our mission, may we not ask that you be good enough to give us an answer to our request.

With assurances of our high regard, we are,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Grand Hotel, Paris, May 27, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State and American Commissioner
to Negotiate Peace, Paris.

SIR: Your letter of the 24th instant conveying the refusal of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace to our request that they should use their good offices to secure the issuance of safe conducts by the British Government to Hons. Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett, was duly received.

Your letter states that you have been informed that every effort was made, unofficially, to bring us into friendly touch with the British representatives in Paris. It is also stated in your letter that you have information to the effect that certain utterances of ours made during our visit to Ireland "gave the deepest offense to certain persons with whom you (we) were seeking to deal."

We beg to advise you that no person was authorized by us to make any effort to bring us into friendly touch with any British representatives, here or elsewhere.

We also beg to further advise you that at no time, in Paris, or elsewhere, have we sought to deal, privately or unofficially, with any persons relative to the purposes of our mission.

In order to make the record perfectly clear, we submit the following:

On March 27, 1919, a letter in form following was delivered in person by the undersigned to the Acting Secretary of State, in your absence, at your office in Washington:

"PARIS, March 27, 1919.

"Hon. FRANK L. POLK,
"Acting Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: We respectfully request the issuance of passports to France to Frank P. Walsh, of New York, N. Y.; Michael J. Ryan, of Philadelphia, Pa.; and Edward F. Dunne, of Chicago, Ill., who have been appointed by the recent Irish race convention held in the city of Philadelphia, Pa., on February 22 and 23, 1919, and whose object in visiting France is to obtain for the delegates, selected by the people of Ireland, a hearing at the peace conference, and to place before the conference, if that hearing be not given, the case of Ireland; her insistence upon her right of self-determination; and to international recognition of the republican form of government established by her people.

"Very respectfully,

"FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman."

We were informed by Mr. Assistant Secretary Phillips that he was acting for you, in your absence, and that the request contained in the letter would receive careful consideration. After a lapse of two days Mr. Assistant Secretary Phillips informed Mr. Patrick Lee, our secretary, that the request contained in the letter had been granted, and that your office had ordered the passports issued, which was accordingly done.

Upon our arrival in Paris a communication was addressed to the President, signed by Messrs. Walsh, Dunne, and Ryan, the full commission, advising him that we were acting in pursuance of a commission given us by the Irish race convention held in Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, and that we were instructed by said convention to obtain, if possible, for the delegates selected by the people of Ireland a hearing at the peace conference, and containing the following specific request:

"May we, therefore, ask you to obtain from Mr. Lloyd-George, or whomsoever may be intrusted with the specific details of such matters by the English Government, safe conduct for Messrs. de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett from Dublin to Paris."

Following an interview between the President and the chairman of our delegation, the matter was taken up with Col. E. M. House, and the identical request was made through him.

The implication of your letter that any person was acting unofficially, privately, or secretly is therefore erroneous.

Attempted negotiations on behalf of Ireland in such fashion would not only be violative of our instructions but obnoxious to the principle, to which we steadfastly adhere with multitudes of our fellow citizens, that a just and permanent peace can only be secured through open conventions openly arrived at.

For the verity of the record, which we are anxious to maintain upon this important matter, will you be good enough to give us the names of the persons to whom we gave deep offense by our utterances in Ireland, and with whom you have been informed we "were seeking to deal," as well as the name or names of any person or persons who assumed to negotiate or promote any such secret or unofficial dealings upon our behalf?

We likewise deem it proper to call your attention at this time to the fact that we scrupulously refrained from any public utterances in England, and that our statements to the people of Ireland as to the objects of our mission were in strict conformity with the purposes stated to you in our written application for passports and cherished and advocated by American citizens since the foundation of the American Republic. We are confident that, if your information is correct to the effect that our utterances gave deep offense, such offense was not given to the Irish people or to their duly elected representatives, in whose presence the utterances were made.

Awaiting your further advices, we are, sir,

Respectfully and sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
By FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, May 27, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We inclose herewith copy of letter received last evening from Mr. Robert Lansing, Secretary of State, together with copy of reply thereto of even date. We submit this so that you may be fully advised pending one further effort to carry out the purposes of our mission.

With assurances of our high esteem and respect, we are,

Sincerely, yours,

COMMISSIONER PLENIPOTENTIARY
OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Paris, May 28, 1919.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 27th instant and hasten to inform you, in reply, that I have neither made nor associated myself in any way with efforts to bring you and your colleagues into touch with the representatives of the British Government in Paris or elsewhere, nor had I, until within the last few days, any knowledge of those efforts.

You, yourselves, have not at any time approached me in the matter, nor was I aware, until quite recently, of the informal action to which you refer.

I may add that I was equally unaware, until a few days ago, of the communication which you addressed to the President upon your arrival in Paris from the United States.

I must, therefore, both personally and as a member of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace with Germany and Austria, decline all responsibility in connection with the outcome of your mission.

Yours, sincerely,

HENRY WHITE.

Hon. HENRY WHITE,
Commissioner Plenipotentiary
of the United States of America, Paris.

DEAR SIR: Please accept our thanks for your prompt and courteous response to our letter of the 27th instant, just received.

With assurance of our appreciation and respect,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.
Paris, May 28, 1919.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have the honor to transmit to you herewith a large number of cablegrams from different parts of the United States, insisting upon the securing of opportunity to present Ireland's case to the peace conference, and protesting against article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations. We trust that you will find time, even with your multiplicity of duties, to give the same careful consideration.

May we also take the opportunity to suggest that the fears of these petitioners as to the effect of article 10, if adopted, seem to have a very substantial basis of fact and reason. It occurs to us, as it doubtless has to them, that the following evil effects might flow from the inclusion of article 10 in its present form:

1. That nations and peoples claiming age-old territorial integrities of their own would, ipso facto, be forced under the authority of other nations or even kingdoms, without a hearing.

2. That peoples, the vast majority of whom are devoted to the principles of free governments such as our own, could be forced under the rule of monarchies or military autocracies.

3. That the signatories, including our country, would be bound, after the adoption of article 10, to prevent the giving of aid by outside advocates of liberty to oppressed nations, which practice has obtained among civilized peoples from time immemorial.

4. That the powerful signatories, including our country, might eventually be compelled to wage war, for the preservation of "territorial integrity," no matter how unjust and oppressive in any part of the world.

In view of the refusal to give the representatives of the Irish people a hearing in Paris, and without consulting with them upon this particular subject, may we not offer the suggestions following, which might apply to the case of Ireland and other nations under like disabilities and similarly situated:

First. Before final adoption of article 10 that a full and open hearing before the committee of four of the great powers at the peace conference be accorded to any nation or people, in order that they may present any questions of fact which they may desire to submit to prove their own territorial integrity, or to dispute the claim of any nation claiming territory to which it is not entitled, or is, at the time of the signing thereof, attempting to acquire or hold by force of arms.

Second. That in any event article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations should be amended so as to read:

"The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled: Provided, however, That the territorial boundaries of no country at the signing of the covenant shall be deemed to include any other country or nation the boundaries of which are natural ones, or clearly defined, inhabited by a homogeneous people, a majority of whom by a vote of its electorate has determined the form of government under which they desire to live, and whose efforts to establish the same and function thereunder are at the time of the signing hereof prevented by an army of occupation or other form of forcible repression."

With assurances of our continued high regard, we remain,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
By FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

DEAR SIR: As representatives of the Irish race convention held in the city of Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, we respectfully request an opportunity of appearing before the members of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace at as early a moment as may be convenient and meet with the pleasure of the commissioners plenipotentiary.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, May 29, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We inclose you herewith copy of letter this day addressed to the secretary of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace.

We were informed by Col. House that daily meetings of the commissioners plenipotentiary are held at the Hotel Crillon, and he was good enough to say that he would be glad to attend at any time an opportunity was given us for a hearing.

We called at the headquarters of the commission at their regular meeting hour this morning, but their meeting had adjourned. Mr. Secretary of State Lansing therefore suggested to us, through his private secretary, that we make this request through the secretary of the commission.

We wish you to be assured that we will occupy but a brief space of time, and indulge the hope that you may accord us this hearing at as early a moment as will meet with your pleasure and convenience, considering your other important duties.

With assurances of our great respect, we are,

Sincerely,

FRANK P. WALSH.

(Letters of similar purport were sent to Messrs. Lansing, White, House, and Bliss.)

—

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, May 31, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We beg to advise you that, in pursuance of the commission given us by the Irish race convention held in the city of Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, and following our letter to you of April 16, 1919, every effort has been made to obtain a hearing for the delegates selected by the people of Ireland to represent them at the peace conference. Our information is that the Government of Great Britain has definitely denied safe conducts to these representatives, and hence they can not appear before the peace conference or any committee thereof.

The resolutions and instructions under which we are acting provide that, if opportunity be not given the regularly chosen representatives of Ireland, we should ourselves present her case; her insistence upon her right of self-determination; and to international recognition of the republican form of government established by her people.

We therefore petition you to use your good offices to secure a hearing for us before the special committee of the four great powers, so that we may discharge the duty imposed upon us by our convention.

In order to avoid misunderstanding, we desire to state, and would thank you to convey the information to the other members of your committee, that we do not hold, or claim to have, any commission or authority from the people of Ireland or their representatives, but desire solely and respectfully to present the resolutions of the American convention with a brief argument in support thereof.

May we also point out that while the convention which we represent was unofficial, and while we claim no official authority in the governmental sense, nevertheless it was a convention composed of 5,132 delegates, democratically selected, representing every State in the American Union; and the individuals who composed it may fairly be said to have been men and women of all shades of political opinion, of all religious sects, and of practically every trade, profession, and avocation which go to make up our national life.

We think it is likewise fair to state that this convention acted for many millions of our fellow citizens, who, in this representative way, respectfully urge you to give favorable response to the request of this petition.

We will deeply appreciate it if you will be good enough to give us an early reply to this letter, as the matter of our departure for home is pressing us.

With considerations of our continued great respect and esteem, we are,

Sincerely,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman,
E. F. DUNNE.

AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Paris, May 31, 1919.

GENTLEMEN: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 29, requesting, as representatives of the Irish race convention held in the city of Philadelphia on February 22, 1919, an opportunity of appearing before the members of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace at as early a moment as may be convenient and meet with the pleasure of the commissioners plenipotentiary.

The commission is led to believe that your object in requesting to be received is to ask its good offices to obtain a hearing before the peace conference of representatives of the so-called "Irish republic." On the basis of this understanding, I am instructed by the American commissioners to express to you their regrets that they are unable to comply with your request, for the reason that it is not within the province of the American delegation to request the peace conference to receive a delegation composed of citizens of a country other than our own, when that country is officially represented at the conference, in regard to a matter having no relation whatever to the making of peace with Germany and Austria.

With assurance of respect, I am, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 2, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Upon this morning Mr. J. C. Grew, secretary general to the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, handed Gov. Dunne and myself a letter, copy of which is inclosed to you herewith. He stated at the same time that you were willing to accord personal interviews to us.

I am deeply appreciative of the courtesy extended, and would be grateful if you will be good enough to indicate at as early a moment as possible, consistent with your great press of affairs, when I might see you.

Always, sincerely,

FRANK P. WALSH.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 2, 1919.

MY DEAR SIR: We beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of May 31 answering ours of the 29th ultimo, handed to us by you in person this morning.

We desire to state that our object in requesting an opportunity of appearing before the American Commission to Negotiate Peace was not to ask its good offices to obtain a hearing before the peace conference of representatives of the Irish republic, as you state in your letter the commission has been led to believe. In order to remove this misapprehension, we respectfully submit the following:

Our information is that the Government of Great Britain has definitely denied safe conducts to these representatives, and hence they can not appear before the peace conference or any committee thereof.

The resolutions and instructions of the Irish race convention, under which we are acting, provide that if opportunity be not given the regularly chosen representatives of Ireland, we should ourselves present her case, her insistence upon her right of self-determination, and to international recognition of the republican form of government established by her people.

We wish to advise the commission further that we do not hold, or claim to have, any commission or authority from the people of Ireland or their representatives; but desire in appearing before the commission solely and respectfully to present the resolution of the American convention with a brief argument in support thereof.

May we also point out that while we claim no official status in the governmental sense, nevertheless we are the representatives of a convention composed of 5,132 delegates, democratically selected, representing every State in the American Union; and the individuals who composed it may fairly be said to have been men and women of all shades of political opinion, of all religious sects, and of practically every trade, profession, and avocation which go to make up our national life.

We think it likewise fair to state that this convention acted for many millions of our fellow citizens, who in this representative way respectfully urge the commission to grant us a full hearing.

We therefore renew our request, and trust that the commission may see its way clear to fix a time, at its pleasure and convenience, when we may appear before it.

Awaiting the favor of an early reply, and with assurances of our great respect, we are,

Sincerely,

FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
E. F. DUNNE.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have the honor to hand you herewith report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference.

On account of the serious and critical situation exposed by the report, we beg that you will be good enough to give this document your careful consideration, and also to present the same to the full peace conference or to the committee of the five great powers, whichever may be the proper course under the practice of the conference. With assurances of our great respect and esteem, we are,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 6, 1919.

SIR: Complying with your request of May 1, 1919, made through Sir William Wiseman and assented to by Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, the representatives at Paris of the Irish republican government, that we visit every part of Ireland, and especially Belfast, to ascertain the actual conditions existing in that country.

We have the honor to inform you that we have, except where prevented by the use of military forces of the English army of occupation, visited the four Provinces of Ireland, including Belfast, as well as the other principal cities and towns.

We have prepared a report covering the facts, with certain recommendations.

In order that the Government of Great Britain may be informed, we herewith hand you copy of this report, which, in addition to the presentation of facts contains a demand for an investigation under the authority of the peace conference.

We also wish to advise your Government that the original of this document has this day been handed to the President of the United States and that copies have been transmitted to the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States through the Secretary of State.

SIR: We have the honor to hand you three copies of document entitled "Report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference," which we have this day transmitted to the President, with copy to Hon. David Lloyd-George, prime minister of England.

In view of the fact that the Senate of the United States is now considering the subject of a new treaty or treaties with the Government of Great Britain, and on account of the further fact that the House of Representatives has heretofore passed a resolution in favor of Ireland's right of self-determination, which has not been acted upon by the peace conference, unless in secret session, of which we have had no advices, we respectfully request that you kindly transmit one copy of this document to the Senate and one to the House of Representatives of the United States, in conformity with the customs and practices of the State Department. AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Paris.

GENTLEMEN: Following Mr. Lansing's letter of the 24th ultimo, conveying to us the opinion of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace that further effort to secure the issuance of safe-conducts by the British Government to Messrs. de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett would be futile and unwise, we proceeded, as you have been individually informed, to ourselves secure a hearing before your full body upon the merits of the Irish case.

While making this effort we are informed that the United States Senate has passed a resolution requesting your honorable body to endeavor to secure a hearing for the same gentlemen before the peace conference, in order that they might present the case of Ireland, and expressing sympathy with the aspirations of the people of Ireland for a government of their own selection.

In this situation we feel that further effort upon our part should be suspended until the resolution is acted upon by your honorable body.

We most respectfully urge, both as American citizens and in our representative capacity, that early and favorable action be taken by your body upon the Senate resolution.

If your commission concludes to so act upon the Senate resolution, and a hearing is granted by the peace conference to the Irish representatives and international recognition is accorded to the republican government set up by the people of Ireland, there will be no necessity for further demand by us upon your valuable time.

Will you therefore be good enough to advise us of whatever action your honorable body may see fit to take at the earliest convenient moment?

With assurances of our appreciation for other courtesies, and indulging the hope of an early response to this communication, we are,

Very respectfully,

GENTLEMEN: Inasmuch as the peace terms are so close to signature, will you not be good enough to advise us at the earliest possible moment as to the disposition by the full peace conference of the Senate resolution as follows:

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States earnestly requests the American Peace Commission at Versailles to endeavor to secure for Edward de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett a hearing before said peace conference in order that they may present the cause of Ireland.

"Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States express its sympathy with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of its own choice."

In addition to the fact that we are receiving constant and urgent inquiries in regard to the same, we wish to respectfully call to your attention that unless action is taken very shortly, the delay itself will amount to a denial of the request.

SIR: The American Commission to Negotiate Peace has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter dated June 17 and previous correspondence regarding the resolution of the Senate of the United States in connection with the appearance of Edward de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett before the peace conference and to inform you that the commission will not fail to comply with the request stated in your above-mentioned letter.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant, J. C. GREW,
Secretary General.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 17, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On the 6th day of June, 1919, we had the honor to forward you our "Report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by peace conference," the investigation to be conducted by an impartial body appointed by the peace conference, and excluding from membership the interested countries; or a committee selected equally by the prime minister of England and the elected representatives of Ireland, the chairman to be agreed upon by parties, or, in case of failure to agree, by the Supreme Court of the United States.

We now beg leave to point out that in the report heretofore forwarded to you the most revolting acts committed against the people of Ireland were not included, for the reason that many of the details of evidence covering the same are in the exclusive possession of the chief secretary for Ireland, Mr. Ian MacPherson, and military and other officials under his authority.

The substantial accuracy of our report has been attested by some of the more progressive and independent newspapers of England; but in view of certain public statements by English officials and certain newspapers, we beg to make the following additions to our report:

(1) Since the submission thereof, through use of an army of spies and agents provocateurs, reprisals have begun against the persons and property of those who are to bear witness to the truth of many of the atrocities reported; and men and women are being arrested upon trumped-up charges and transported to places distant from their homes and friends, so as to be deprived of assistance or defense.

(2) The only charge in the report heretofore submitted to you which has, so far as we know, received specific denial at the hands of any English authority is the following:

"Police and soldiers are habitually permitted to enter the cells where political prisoners are confined and to beat them with their clubs."

We are ready to substantiate this charge before the commission of inquiry, (a) by the production of large numbers of witnesses who have been thus beaten; (b) by proof of witnesses of the highest standing, including American citizens, who examined the cells of the prisoners shortly after the beatings and found the fresh blood still covering the walls of the cells; (c) by the production of prisoners whose injuries did not prove fatal, but who have been maimed and disfigured for life by the beatings of the soldiers and police.

In view of the conditions in Ireland as herein and heretofore set forth, which we earnestly insist can not be ignored if the peace of the world is to be accomplished, as well as the fact that if prompt action is not taken many more innocent lives may be lost and further brutalities committed, with the apparent sanction of other nations; that evidence now in existence may be destroyed, and witnesses placed beyond the reach of the commission of inquiry, we respectfully request that you will be good enough to at once place these additional facts before the peace conference and urge upon it the necessity and justice of prompt acquiescence in the demand for a hearing before an impartial tribunal such as heretofore described.

With considerations of our continued esteem and great respect,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,

GENTLEMEN: We inclose to you herewith copy of letter this day forwarded to Hon. David Lloyd-George, British prime minister, relating to the case of Countess Markievicz.

If your honorable commission can officially or individually aid in securing the release of this worthy woman, we beg to assure you that the ends of justice will be served thereby, and that it will be an act of humanity for which you will receive the kindly gratitude of many millions of people.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 19, 1919.

HON. DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE,
British Prime Minister, Paris.

SIR: We desire to respectfully call your attention to the case of Countess Markievicz, and to enter our most solemn protest against the conduct of the British Government and its officials toward her.

On June 6, 1919, we had the honor to submit to you, for your official consideration and action as Prime Minister of Great Britain a report of certain atrocities and cruelties inflicted by the English army of occupation on the inhabitants of Ireland, with a demand for the appointment of a special committee of inquiry by the peace conference.

We have been advised that the Countess Markievicz, who is a member of the Irish parliament and minister of labor in the Irish republican cabinet, has been arrested and confined in jail upon an inconsequential charge; and that the punishment now being inflicted upon her is in the nature of a reprisal and in retaliation for giving information in regard to certain of the atrocities contained in our report.

We wish to point out that the Countess Markievicz is a woman of refinement, splendid intellectual gifts, courageous spirit, and of spotless character, and has a place deep in the affections of the people of Ireland as well as many millions in the United States.

During our interviews with the Countess Markievicz, in Dublin, a few weeks ago, we observed that while she is a woman of high spirit and strong will, her health is not robust, and we greatly fear that the harshness of jail life may result in her death.

Our reasons for making the charge that the cruelties now being inflicted upon the Countess Markievicz are in the nature of reprisals by the British Government are as follows:

(1) Much of the detailed evidence of atrocities committed against women prisoners in Ireland was furnished us by the Countess Markievicz.

(2) She has in her possession the evidence of certain unspeakable outrages, the details of which have not yet been published, but which we intend to submit to the commission of inquiry when selected by the peace conference.

(3) We have indubitable proof at hand that during the course of our investigation in Ireland the Countess Markievicz was shadowed by spies in the employ of the British Government, and direct threats were made against her during the progress of our inquiry.

(4) She was arrested on a frivolous charge after our report was sent to you, and while publication of it was absolutely forbidden in Ireland, where the facts were easily ascertainable, and during the time the same was being withheld from publication by the English press.

(5) The sentence imposed upon her is for a length of time which would keep her in jail during the inquiry that may be made by the peace conference.

(6) The alleged utterances for which she is now imprisoned were made a month or more before her arrest, and no action had been taken upon them, as we are informed, until after the receipt of our report on English atrocities by the chief secretary for Ireland, Mr. Ian MacPherson.

(7) That during our visit to Ireland we heard many public utterances of the same import as those for which the Countess Markievicz is in jail, delivered in and out of the Irish parliament, and upon which no action whatever was taken by the Government.

We sincerely hope that, animated by a decent regard for the opinion of mankind, which we know you cherish, and in view of the foregoing considerations, especially having in mind the danger to the life of the Countess Markievicz through continued suffering in jail, you will use your great powers and authority as prime minister of Great Britain to secure the immediate release of this worthy woman.

We have, moreover, reason to apprehend that arrests of other women who suffered atrocities on their own persons while in jail, or who were witnesses to them being practiced on others, are impending, and that it is the purpose of the English Government to imprison in Ireland or remove from that country men and women whose testimony may be indispensable to the proposed investigation.

We wish to assure you that we are not making this request at the instance of the Countess Markievicz, nor at the suggestion of the representatives of the republican government in Ireland, but on the grounds—

(a) Of our common humanity; and

(b) So that when the committee of inquiry is appointed those upon whom atrocities have been practiced, or who have witnessed the same, will not be dead, incarcerated in prison, or so broken in health as to be unable to attend the hearing.

Respectfully,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman,
E. F. DUNNE.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 20, 1919.

AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Paris.

GENTLEMEN: We beg to advise you that the American Federation of Labor at its national annual session now being held at Atlantic City, N. J., by unanimous vote adopted a resolution urging the international recognition of the republican form of government now existing in Ireland and urging the peace conference to give a hearing to Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett on the case of Ireland.

May we point out some of the reasons which we respectfully submit should move your honorable body to make every effort to have this resolution complied with:

(1) The American Federation of Labor has enrolled in its membership more than 3,000,000 men and women, with a sphere of legitimate influence embracing many millions more.

(2) The American Federation of Labor contributed a high percentage to the overseas army of the American Expeditionary Forces.

(3) The organization was the basis and strong bulwark of the division of industry behind the military forces of the United States, without which the war could not have been won.

(4) Mainly through the efforts of this great organization, its veteran leader, and other officials the productivity of our country during the great World War was maintained at the highest point, and not one day's delay was occasioned in the production of essential war materials by strikes or labor disputes.

(5) The American Federation of Labor, aside from its purely industrial activities, is, we believe, without exaggeration, the most powerful force existent in the world to-day for the maintenance of that democracy cherished and practiced by us, and for the universal establishment of which America entered the World War, and to which the world must look for safety amid the clash of conflicting governmental ideas, ranging from the reactionary ambitions of monarchies and autocracies to the extreme dangers of unrestraint and chaos.

We also take this occasion to point out that since we made our original request to your honorable body on behalf of the Irish race in America, urging you to endeavor to secure a hearing for the Irish case before the peace conference, the United States Senate, with practical unanimity, has made the same request; and we have transmitted to you from bodies representing vast numbers of American citizens of all shades of political belief, composing all groups which make up our national life, cablegrams to the same effect.

In view of the fact that the day is so close at hand upon which we all earnestly hope the terms of peace will be signed, with the greatest respect, but with all urgency, we would ask the favor of a reply to the following questions:

(a) Has the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, or any individual member thereof, made a request to the general peace conference for a hearing for Messrs. de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett?

(b) Has your honorable body, or any individual member thereof, made a request to the peace conference for the international recognition of the Irish republic?

(c) Has your honorable body, or any individual member thereof, made request of the peace conference for any person or persons to present the case of Ireland and its right to self-determination to the peace conference?

(d) If all or any such requests have been made, have the same been considered by the peace conference; and, if so, has answer thereto been received from the peace conference or any official representative thereof?

(e) If such requests have not been made, will your honorable body be good enough, in view of the manifold petitions and appeals herein referred to, and in the cause of humanity and justice, to make such requests, or any thereof which you may deem proper; and, if so, promptly advise us as to the result or make the same public, so that all of your petitioners may be advised?

With considerations of our great respect and esteem, we are,

Sincerely,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. FRANK P. WALSH,
American Commission for Irish Independence,
Grand Hotel, Paris.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge, on behalf of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, the receipt of your letter of June 20, in which you advise the commission of a resolution adopted by the American Federation of Labor at its annual session now being held at Atlantic City and ask certain questions with regard to the recent Senate resolution.

In reply to your letter I beg to inform you that, in accordance with advice which has already been given you, a copy of the said Senate resolution was forwarded to the president of the peace conference, Mr. Clemenceau. Mr. Clemenceau, alone, is competent to bring this whole question to the attention of the conference. Beyond this, of course—as you very readily will appreciate—neither the American commission as a whole nor any of its individual members can take any further steps in the premises.

I am, sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. C. GREW, Secretary General.

PARIS, June 25, 1919.

IAN MACPHERSON,
Chief Secretary for Ireland,
Dublin Castle, Dublin, Ireland:

Proof has been submitted to us at Paris that you are using your official power as well as the forces of the English Army of Occupation in Ireland to suppress our full reply to your answer to our report on conditions in Ireland, which was made on the 21st instant. Your answer, published broadcast, made denials of certain portions of our report and serious personal accusations against us. We are also advised that through the same instrumentalities you are suppressing altogether or causing to be printed garbled accounts of statements and affidavits made by individuals and officials in Ireland supporting the report of our commission and challenging the accuracy of your answer. We most earnestly protest against this unfair procedure and arbitrary abuse of authority as repugnant to the modern conception of justice and fair play held by right thinking men and women, which we had hoped applied to the English officials in Ireland as well as to the rest of mankind.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.
Paris, June 27, 1919.

M. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU,
President of the Peace Conference and Premier of France, Paris.

Monsieur le PRESIDENT: We have received formal notification from the secretary general of the American Commission to Negotiate Peace that the whole Irish question is now referable to you alone.

We therefore beg leave, as the representatives of the Irish race in America, to submit to you copies of the following documents, i. e.:

(a) The repudiation by the representatives of the Irish republic of the usurped right of England to enter into obligations or agreements affecting Ireland.

(b) Official report of the American commission on Irish independence on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference.

Pending action by the full peace conference upon the request already submitted to you by Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, the envoys of the Irish republic at Paris, for a full hearing before the peace conference, we desire to urge upon you the urgent necessity of the early creation of an impartial commission of inquiry to investigate and report upon the actual state of war now existing between the people of Ireland and the English army of occupation, with special reference to the atrocities and acts of barbarism still being perpetrated.

Since the filing of our original report with President Wilson and the American commission to negotiate peace, the following acts of savagery are being perpetrated by the English army of occupation on the Irish people, which we submit are in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, and which, if permitted to continue, will render impossible the just pacification of the world, for which its people are so earnestly striving:

(1) Lives are being taken or men and women are being maimed and wounded daily.

(2) An organized effort to destroy the homes of the peoples of Ireland is being waged.

(3) Orders of banishment are issued frequently against people, commanding them to leave their homes at the risk of death and under penalty of imprisonment.

(4) Raids are being made upon peaceful towns and villages by aeroplanes.

(5) The homes and places of business of the inhabitants are being invaded and ransacked; looting is being carried on in a most shameful manner.

(6) Property of great value is being confiscated, for which reparation will be impossible unless opportunity is quickly given to prove and inventory the losses.

(7) Barricades and emplacements for artillery and machine guns are being erected which menace the lives and property of the people.

(8) The meeting places of the workers of Ireland are surrounded by machine guns, so that the workers are in imminent peril of death while endeavoring to carry on the lawful and ordinary activities of their organizations.

(9) Reprisals of a cruel and unusual character are being practiced in retaliation for the efforts to present the case of Ireland to the peace conference.

(10) Delicate and aged men and women are being confined in noisome and insanitary jails solely on account of their political opinions.

As the president of the peace conference, to which the peoples of the world are looking for the establishment of peace and the adoption of instrumentalities which will put an end to existing wars and prevent future conflicts, we most earnestly urge upon you the immediate presentation of the accompanying documents to your honorable body, and the great necessity for early action thereon.

With considerations of our high esteem and respect, we are,

Respectfully,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
E. F. DUNNE.

[Personal and urgent.]

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.
Paris, July 22, 1919.

M. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU,
President of the Peace Conference and Premier of France, Paris.

Monsieur le PRESIDENT: We are in receipt of information from sources of high authorities that, as president of the peace conference, you have notified American peace plenipotentiaries that, so far as further consideration of the Irish question is concerned, the matter is one in which you will take no action.

We understand this decision covers—

1. That the resolution of the American Senate, officially forwarded to you by the American Commission to Negotiate Peace, and the recommendations contained therein expressing sympathetic support to the people of Ireland in their efforts to obtain a government of their own choice, is, by this action, denied in a manner suggestive of your entire disregard of American public opinion as rendered in the deliberate resolution of our highest legislative body.

2. That the peace conference further ignores the request of the Hon. Messrs. Walsh and Dunne for the appointment of an international tribunal to investigate into the charges of barbarities and inhuman conduct, in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, perpetrated by the British Government through its military forces in occupation of Ireland, and upon its defenseless people.

The knowledge of your decision in these matters has been, up to now, withheld from the American public. The results of the publication of this information will doubtless have very material weight at this time while the attention of the United States Senate is occupied in matters of international importance, in which we feel France has a material interest. Arrangements have already been made for giving widespread publicity in America to this decision on your part. But before taking this step, we respectfully suggest that an audience may be granted by you to the undersigned to present the importance of the situation, particularly in this relation to the future interests of France, of America, and of Great Britain.

There are 20,000,000 citizens of Irish blood in the United States, and the effect of this information, when published there, needs no characterization by us to indicate how grave may be the danger to the continuance of those same relations of amity and esteem that have marked the friendships existing between the French, American, and Irish peoples.

Trusting that I may be accorded the honor of this audience with you at your earliest possible convenience, and, with assurances of high esteem and respect, we have the honor to remain,

Sincerely, yours,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
JOHN ARCHDEACON MURPHY,
Commissioner in Charge.

REPORT ON CONDITIONS IN IRELAND, WITH DEMAND FOR INVESTIGATION BY THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

The Irish race convention held in Philadelphia on the 22d and 23d of February, 1919, provided by resolution for the appointment of a committee of 25 by the chairman, and instructed it to use all honorable means to secure for Ireland her right of self-determination.

This general committee selected from its own body Frank P. Walsh, of New York; former Gov. Edward F. Dunne, of Illinois; and Michael J. Ryan, of Philadelphia, as a special commission to go to Paris. The instructions of this special committee were as follows:

"To obtain for the delegates selected by the people of Ireland a hearing at the peace conference, and to place before the conference, if that hearing be not given, the case of Ireland; her insistence upon her right of self-determination; and to international recognition of the republican form of government established by her people."

Upon their arrival at Paris a letter signed by all the commissioners was addressed to President Wilson, asking him to obtain from the British Government safe-conducts for Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and Count George Noble Plunkett, the representatives selected by the people of Ireland, from Dublin to Paris and return; and also asking him to accord an interview to the American commission.

In response to this letter the President wrote to Mr. Walsh, chairman of the commission, granting him an interview, and fixing the time.

The President gave an exhaustive hearing to the case as presented by Mr. Walsh, and referred him to Col. E. M. House, with instructions to say that he believed the request a proper one, and that it should be granted.

The entire commission waited upon Col. House, advised him of the suggestion of the President, and presented the request in writing for safe-conducts for Messrs. De Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett. Col. House promised to take the matter up with Mr. Lloyd-George immediately and to use every effort to have the safe-conducts granted.

Upon the following day Col. House announced to the commission, who again called upon him in a body, that he had communicated with the prime minister of England, and that in all likelihood the safe-conducts would be granted; but that Mr. Lloyd-George was very desirous of having an interview with the American commissioners personally and would be glad to have Chairman Walsh take up the matter of fixing the time and place for the meeting with Mr. Lloyd-George's confidential secretary, Mr. Philip Kerr.

The commission notified Col. House at once that they did not seek a conference with Mr. Lloyd-George; doubted very much the wisdom or propriety of meeting him; but finally agreed to do so as a matter of courtesy.

Later in the day the entire commission called upon Col. House and stated that under no circumstances did they wish to be relegated to Mr. Lloyd-George on the question of the issuance of the safe-conducts, but were relying upon him—Col. House—as one of the American commissioners, to secure compliance with the request, if possible. With this clear understanding they would meet the prime minister.

Mr. Lloyd-George, on the plea of being closely occupied with the preparation of the German peace terms, put off the proposed meeting with the delegates from time to time, covering a period of something like two weeks.

The American commission finally called upon Col. House, explained once more that no part of the duties of their mission called for a meeting with Mr. Lloyd-George, and asked him to address a formal request for the safe-conducts for Messrs. De Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett, to Mr. Lloyd-George, and secure, if possible, a prompt and direct answer to that request.

Upon the same day, and shortly before the visit of the commission to Col. House, Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, the representative of the Irish republic in Paris, conveyed an invitation from President de Valera to the commission to visit Dublin, and gave, among other reasons, the necessity for a conference upon matters of grave importance at the time transpiring in Ireland.

When we arrived at the office of Col. House in the Hotel Crillon that evening to receive an answer from Mr. Lloyd-George we found Sir William Wiseman, the liaison officer between the American and British embassies in Paris. He presented the apologies of Mr. Lloyd-George for the delay, and said that Mr. Lloyd-George would like to fix a time for the interview upon some day of the following week. Mr. Walsh, speaking for the commission, replied that if they were to remain another week in Paris before receiving an answer to their request for the safe-conducts, they wished to use the time in a visit to Ireland for the purpose of meeting the representatives of the Irish people and of making a first-hand investigation of conditions in Ireland.

As the passports of the members of the commission did not include England and Ireland, it was necessary to have them amended, which was expeditiously done, the amended passports reading that the members of the commission were going to Ireland on an "unofficial political mission," and the forms of the passports were made diplomatic, which greatly facilitated their movements.

It should be noted that after the visit to Ireland demands were made in the English Parliament for a full report from the prime minister as to whether or not it was true that he intended issuing safe conducts to the Irish representatives, and also if it was his purpose to have an interview in Paris with the members of the American commission.

Mr. Bonar Law, leader of the House of Commons, made official answer for the prime minister and stated that Mr. Lloyd-George had not and never had the slightest intention of granting safe conducts to the Irish representatives. He said that Mr. Lloyd-George had agreed to the visit of the American commission to Ireland, hoping upon their return that he could press upon them the "English point of view," to be used as propaganda in America.

The lord chancellor, officially replying to the same questions in the House of Lords, likewise denied, on behalf of the prime minister, that there was ever any intention to grant safe conducts to Messrs de Valera, Griffith, and Plunkett, and declared it was the purpose of the prime minister to have present at his interview with the American commission upon their return from Ireland all of the American newspaper correspondents, so that he (the prime minister) might make a statement of England's attitude on the Irish problem which would tend to allay the growing prejudice against England in the United States.

When the passports were handed to the American commissioners on the morning of their departure for Ireland, Sir William Wiseman stated that Mr. Lloyd-George wished the commission to go to all parts of Ireland, if possible, and it was his especial request that they should visit Belfast.

Upon repeating Sir William Wiseman's request to Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, the envoys of the Irish republican government at Paris, they joined in the request that we should make a close investigation of conditions in Ireland, and especially urged that we should visit the jails, particularly those in the larger cities, where, they asserted, hundreds of men and women were confined under circumstances of the most shocking nature.

Crossing the Irish Sea from Holyhead to Dunleary we came upon the first evidence of the military occupation of Ireland. The vessel and wharves swarmed with soldiers, fully equipped for the field, going to and coming from Ireland.

When we arrived in Ireland we found soldiers everywhere. A careful investigation made on the day before we left Ireland showed that the army of occupation numbers considerably over 100,000 men, to which accessions are being made daily. The troops are equipped with lorries, armored cars, tanks, machine guns, bombing planes, light and heavy artillery; and in fact all of the engines of war lately employed against the Central Powers.

In addition to this there are approximately 15,000 members of the Royal Irish Constabulary. The constabulary is a branch of the military forces. They are armed with rifles, as well as small side arms, engage in regular drill and field maneuvers. They are never residents of the districts which they occupy, and have quarters in regular Government barracks.

After our arrival in Ireland we conferred with President de Valera as to the prisons which we should visit, and Mountjoy Jail, in the city of Dublin, was selected, for the reason that it contained a large number of political prisoners, many of them men of the highest character and standing. Mountjoy, so far as physical equipment and brutality of conduct goes, is not as bad as many of the other jails in Ireland.

We made our demand for permission to visit this jail through the municipal authorities of the city of Dublin. The governor of the prison, a resident of England, who had been in office but a few weeks, refused us admission. It was then explained to Sir John Irwin, chairman of the visiting justices of Mountjoy prison, that the commission was traveling on diplomatic passports and was investigating conditions in Ireland, partly at the solicitation of the prime minister. With this explanation Sir John Irwin, who is in supreme authority of the jail, overruled the decision of the governor and we were admitted to Mountjoy.

When we appeared at the gate we were ushered into the office of the governor, where we found Sir John Irwin. The governor told us that we were to be admitted to the prison, but with the understanding that we should not speak to any prisoner nor seek to fix the identity of any prisoner exhibited.

Although Mountjoy is called a jail it is, as a matter of fact, a combination of jail and penitentiary. It is surrounded by a stone wall 20 feet in height, and is larger than any of the mid-western American penitentiaries, such as Jefferson City or Joliet, and almost as large as Sing Sing. It has immense cell houses, built to accommodate approximately 1,000 prisoners. It is equipped with workshops, where men convicted of serious crimes are confined at hard labor. It is also used for the confinement of persons awaiting trial, as well as misdemeanants serving sentences for petty offenses.

Exclusive of the political prisoners, there were but 12 persons in confinement, all of them undergoing sentence for petty infractions of law.

One of the men who accompanied us upon the visit was an official of the city of Dublin, well acquainted with all of the political prisoners, so that we had no difficulty in identifying them. They were confined for the most part in groups, the majority of them being locked up in steel cages built in the yards of the prison, entirely outside of the buildings proper. These cages are exact duplicates of those used for wild animals in the larger zoological gardens such as Lincoln Park and the Bronx in the United States.

Statements had been made that unspeakable outrages were being committed against the persons of these men and the most barbarous cruelties inflicted upon them—that they had been starved, beaten, confined in dark and noisome underground cells, otherwise maltreated, and kept for days with their hands handcuffed behind their backs.

We attempted to secure statements from the officers, either confirming or denying the charges. We were permitted to talk to no one inside the prison except the governor. He stated that no such barbarities had been committed since he had taken charge of the prison a week or two before. He refused to speak for any time prior to that. He at first denied that there were underground cells in the prison. We had been furnished, however, with a plan showing their location, and upon our insistence we were allowed entrance. We found a great number of cells underground too narrow for human occupation, without beds or covering for the prisoners, no ventilation, pitch dark, and extremely cold, although the weather at the time was not severe. The chief warden admitted that these cells were at times occupied by prisoners.

Our information, well authenticated, is to the effect that a large number of political prisoners were taken out of the underground cells after we had demanded admission the night previous.

We found one of the political prisoners still in solitary confinement. He presented a pitiable spectacle. The miserable cell was cold and badly ventilated. He was in an unkempt conditon, highly nervous, palpably undernourished, and had a wild glare in his eyes, indicating an extremely dangerous mental state. He tried to speak to us, but was quickly silenced by the warder.

The political prisoners in this jail, without exception, are men of the highest standing—journalists, lawyers, business men, skilled tradesmen, and laborers. Many of them, confined for months, have not been informed of the charge against them. All of them are denied the right of trial by jury. When charges are made—often of the most trivial character—bail is denied. They were all emaciated and appeared to be suffering from malnutrition. Of the thousands of German prisoners we have seen in France none of them showed such wretched physical condition or had countenances so marked with pain as the prisoners in Mountjoy.

As we were leaving the prison we were attracted by shouts in the rear of the main hall of the prison. Looking around we saw Pierce Beasley, one of the political prisoners, an Irish journalist of the highest standing, and one of the most beloved men in Ireland, being hustled through the back doorway by a burly prison guard.

Beasley cried out, "I want to call your attention to the fact that this brute who has me in charge is about to punish me for saying, 'Long live the republic.'" We immediately protested against the assault on Mr. Beasley. The governor of the prison hastened back to where the men were, and, after a hurried whispered conversation with the guard, returned and said that we could be assured that no punishment would be inflicted upon Mr. Beasley.

Upon our return from the prison we were furnished with detailed statements of others who had been confined in the prison, exposing the vilest atrocities committed against prisoners.

Having received information that there were a large number of prisoners confined in a smaller prison in the town of Westport, County Mayo, which place was invested by troops, we announced our intention after leaving Mountjoy jail, of visiting Westport. Shortly before the departure of our train upon the following evening two policemen appeared at our apartments, and handed us an unsigned typewritten letter, notifying us that we would not be permitted to enter the town of Westport, the only reason given being that it was "within a military area." We proceeded, nevertheless, to Westport.

As we approached the town a company of soldiers met us about 3 miles out, and the lieutenant announced, in a surly tone, that under no circumstances would we be permitted to enter. We demanded to see the colonel, to whom we showed our passports, repeated the message of Mr. Lloyd-George delivered through Sir William Wiseman, to the effect that he wanted us to visit all of Ireland, explained that we were conducting an investigation under the authority of the Prime Minister. We advised him that we understood that revolting conditions existed in Westport. The colonel, however, declared that he would take the full responsibility of not complying with the request of even so high a personage as the Prime Minister of England, though he stated that he was acting on orders from the Government officials in Dublin.

Many of the persons we met in the vicinity corroborated the stories of brutal treatment to which prisoners in the Westport jail were being subjected, the details being horrible beyond belief.

During our visit to Ireland we witnessed numerous assaults in public streets and highways with bayonets and clubbed rifles upon men and women known to be republicans, or suspected of being in favor of a republican form of government. Many of the outraged persons were men and women of exemplary character and occupying high positions in the business and professional life of the country.

We took statements covering hundreds of cases of outrage and violence committed by the officers and representatives of the English Government in Ireland, the details of which we set forth herein.

The excesses and atrocities detailed are either being actually committed at the present time or have been committed within the recent past, as a part of a scheme and plan to crush out and repress the effort of the Irish people to establish a republican form of government in Ireland.

Upon the basis of what we witnessed ourselves, as well as statements of men and women of unimpeachable integrity, we make the following specific charges:

(1) Within the past few months at least 10 citizens have been killed by soldiers and constables under circumstances which in a majority of the cases coroners' juries found to be willful murder under the laws of England; the last man having been murdered in this way less than one month ago.

In all of these cases the perpetrators of the crimes have gone unpunished.

(2) Hundreds of men and women have been confined for months in the vilest prisons without any charges being preferred against them.

(3) At least five men have died as the result of atrocities perpetrated upon them while in prison, the post-mortem examination in some of the cases disclosing marks of violence upon the bodies of the victims.

(4) Prisoners are confined in narrow cells with hands handcuffed behind them day and night. In this condition they are fed by jail attendants. They are permitted no opportunity of answering calls of nature and are compelled to lie in their clothing, befouled by human excrement, for days at a time.

(5) Persons are confined in cells which are not large enough for one man. They are not provided with beds or bunks of any kind, but are compelled to sleep upon the bare floors. There are no toilet facilities or receptacles to contain the human offal, which necessarily accumulates upon the floors where men are compelled to sleep in the filth night after night.

(6) The food is insufficient and unwholesome. Prisoners, men and women, are compelled to live for days upon water and poorly baked, sour, and stale bread.

(7) Hundreds of men and women have been discharged from jail with impaired constitutions, and are in many cases incurable invalids as a result of their treatment.

(8) During the past winter and spring streams of ice-cold water were poured upon men confined in jail, and they were compelled to lie all night on cold floors in unheated cells in their wet clothing. Many of them were afterwards removed to outside hospitals suffering with pneumonia.

(9) Police and soldiers are habitually permitted to enter the cells where political prisoners are confined and to beat them with their clubs.

(10) Solitary confinement in most horrible form is generally practiced. Numbers of prisoners have been taken directly from the jails to insane asylums, rendered maniacs by their treatment.

(11) Large bodies of political prisoners, in certain jails, have been kept without any food whatever for days at a time.

(12) The right of privacy no longer exists in Ireland. The homes of the people are constantly being invaded by armed men, and the occupants, including delicate women and young children, cruelly beaten and otherwise maltreated.

(13) The children of suspected republicans, many of tender years, are kidnapped and their parents kept in ignorance of their whereabouts for weeks.

(14) Women and children of refinement and respectability are arrested without warrant and, in company of rough and brutal soldiers, transported to distant parts of Ireland and England, where they are confined in jail with the lowest prostitutes, some of whom are suffering from vile diseases, and are compelled to use the same toilet facilities and thus expose themselves to the danger of infection.

(15) The right of private property no longer exists in Ireland. Places of business of republicans are invaded by soldiers and constables, fixtures destroyed, and property confiscated without compensation. In many cases the owner of such businesses and property are utterly impoverished.

(16) Heads of hundreds of families have been jailed or deported, leaving dependent women and children without means of subsistence and rendered objects of public charity.

(17) Men and women on mere suspicion of having republican sympathies are being taken from their homes and arrested upon the streets and highways of Ireland, deported to England, or confined in jails in remote places, while their distracted families are kept sometimes for many months in ignorance of their whereabouts.

Among the leaders of the republican movement in Ireland, many of whom have had these atrocities practiced upon their persons, are lawyers, such as Edward Duggan, George Nichols, and John Hanrahan, who rank relatively with such men in the United States as Morgan J. O'Brien, John B. Stanchfield, Levi Mayer, or A. Mitchell Palmer.

Some of the men whom we actually saw in jail in a pitiable condition were newspaper men who rank with Henry Watterson or the late Col. William R. Nelson, of Kansas City. This comparison is made because two of the prisoners in Mountjoy, Messrs. Pierce Beasley and William Seares, are the owners or principal stockholders of papers which they edit themselves. Many others we actually saw in prison are working newspaper men and correspondents of high-class publications, such as Charles H. Grasty, Frank H. Simmonds, and Herbert Bayard Swope.

Among the men we saw in prison are stock raisers and farmers, business men of large affairs, and literary men of brilliant parts and of the highest character.

We witnessed while in Ireland a brutal and unprovoked assault by an English colonel and a crowd of soldiers upon the person of Prof. John Mac Neill. Prof. Mac Neill is a member of the faculty of the National University, is an educator and publicist of the highest type, a Member of Parliament, and occupies relatively the same position in Ireland that William Howard Taft or Nicholas Murray Butler does in the United States.

EDUCATION.

If England ever had an educational system in Ireland, it has completely broken down.

The Irish people are taxed more for the support of the police and constabulary, although the country is practically crimeless in the ordinary sense, than they are for the maintenance of the whole educational system of Ireland, including the upkeep of the National University, Trinity College, as well as all the primary and other schools in the land.

School teachers in the primary schools are paid as low as $4 per week.

No system of hygiene or sanitation has been installed. The teeth of practically all the children are in decay, and respiratory and throat troubles exist to an alarming degree.

Lack of decent clothing and undernourishment is keeping thousands of children out of school.

ANTISOCIAL CONDITIONS.

In the city of Dublin alone there are 20,000 families, on an average of five to each family, living in one-room tenements. Infant mortality is appalling. Destitution and hunger are rife.

Municipal bodies and private persons attempted to extend relief, but such activities must have the sanction of the English Government, which is difficult, if not impossible, to obtain.

LAND LAWS.

The much vaunted land laws have not appreciably aided in decreasing poverty in the agricultural districts.

Leaving out of the question the manifold defects and hardships in the operations of the law, all the farmer might gain by his ownership of the land is taken away from him by unjust taxes and monopolistic control of the necessaries of life.

When the first land law was passed in 1881 the direct per capita tax in Ireland was about $6 per head. At the present time the direct taxation imposed by British law amounts annually to the enormous sum of $45 per head.

Indirect taxation of the people can not be accurately estimated, but is higher proportionately than in any other country in the world.

The age-old curse of absentee landlordism still cuts deeply into the economic heart of Ireland. Hundreds of thousands of its most fertile acres are owned by foreigners. As quickly as the rich crops are garnered they are taken out of the country, and this immense food supply and almost infinite source of wealth is lost to her people forever.

England has cut off Ireland from the outside commerce of the world, allows no ship to come trans-Atlantic to her ports, and thus controls the prices of the necessaries of life for her inhabitants.

This combined system of taxation and monopoly automatically takes away the legitimate profit from the farmer, no matter how fertile the land, propitious the season, or energetic the individual, and sucks the lifeblood out of all industry.

LABOR.

Ireland has the best organized and most coherent labor movement in the world. It is being thwarted and suppressed by the army and constabulary. Wages of unskilled workers are below a line which means to them hunger, cold, and privation. The wage of skilled labor is far below the minimum for decent existence.

In many of the larger cities and towns the trade-unions have a 100 per cent organization. We met and interviewed almost all of the national leaders of labor. The heads of the National Irish Labor Party, which is in control of the situation, are, without exception, ardent republicans, fully alive to their rights and insisting on self-determination for Ireland. They have all been the innocent victims of atrocities against their own persons such as are enumerated herein in the jails of Ireland and England.

They work along traditional trade-union lines. If their country is not freed of foreign control and exploitation, and quickly, many of them declare that in sheer defense of their own lives they will be compelled to set up local Soviet governments and refuse longer to produce wealth for their oppressors.

THE REVOLUTION.

Ireland for the first time in more than 100 years is absolutely cut off from England, its regularly elected members of Parliament having with few exceptions refused to go to Westminster. They are attempting, under the guns of the English soldiers, to hold orderly sessions in the Mansion House in Dublin.

There is a military organization of approximately 200,000 republican volunteers of fighting age, poorly equipped as to arms and without artillery. They appear to be well officered, and seemingly maintain a perfect organization, engaging in daily drills and frequent maneuvers. Upon all sides may be heard declarations that they are ready to fight and die for the right of self-determination, no matter how great the odds against them may be.

Guerilla warfare of the character which usually precedes major conflicts is now going on in Ireland. Almost every day there are fights between small detachments of the army of occupation and groups of republican volunteers. One day the British soldiers prevail, with the result that citizens are killed. In another day or two perhaps the republican volunteers are successful, with the result that soldiers are killed. Frequently the British soldiery wound and capture the volunteers, and in turn the volunteers kill or wound the soldiers and retake the prisoners.

With a ferocity unparalleled even in the history of modern warfare, within the past few days men and women have been shot down in the streets of Dublin.

The killing by the British Government of these republican volunteers would not settle the Irish problem. Those below the fighting age, and even the children of Ireland, are singing The Soldiers' Song, shouting "Long live the republic," and trying to enlist in the revolutionary movement.

ENGLISH TESTIMONY.

Mr. Erskine Childers, an English writer of high repute, who served Great Britain throughout the war in the Royal Naval Flying Corps, coming out a major, made the following declaration in regard to the Irish situation in the London Daily Herald of May 26, 1919:

"I could bomb a crowd from an aeroplane with a better conscience (and more skill) than engage in this cold-blooded, systematic condemnation of respectable people to the rigors and ignominies of jail life—to loss of health, loss of business and career, too often to loss of life; not for breaking the moral law, but in very truth of obeying that universal law which impels men worthy of the name of men to become free."

Lord Cavendish Bentinck, a Unionist member of the House of Commons, within the last month declared upon the floor of that body that England was not governing Ireland, but was engaged in a mere scuffle with the Irish people.

The lord chancellor of England, in an official report to the House of Lords within the last fortnight, made the confession that the vast majority of the people of Ireland were now in open rebellion against the rule of the British Government.

Right Hon. Herbert H. Asquith, former prime minister of Great Britain, made the following statement upon June 2, 1919, which appeared in to-day's London Daily Mail:

"Lord French is at present viceroy of Ireland, which to-day is the darkest of the dark spots on the map, not of Great Britain, but of the world."

DEMAND FOR INVESTIGATION.

All of the charges herein made are based upon the actual observation of the signers while in Ireland, or upon the statements of men and women of unimpeachable character, who are prepared to make direct legal proof of every crime and atrocity set forth.

The Government of Great Britain, up to this time, has measurably succeeded in hiding the details of these atrocities from the peace conference and the people of the world. From time to time, when crimes and atrocities are forced into publicity, they are met in three ways.

(a) Some distinguished English statesman or high official, usually one without personal knowledge of the facts, solemnly denies the truth of the charges.

(b) The British press impressively and unanimously denounces the charges as false, and carries many communications from persons claiming to have knowledge of the facts, and bearing testimony to their falsity.

(c) Government investigations before partisan judges, where testimony is controlled by implicated officials, resort often being had to intimidation of witnesses and subornation of perjury.

In order that the peace conference may act in the light of knowledge of the conditions, and be fully advised as to the effort of England to keep the people of Ireland in subjection by military power and violence, in contravention of the principles for which the peace conference was convoked, we respectfully urge the appointment of a commission to ascertain the facts and report the same to the peace conference, and respectfully submit the following alternative suggestions as to its formation and appointment:

(a) That an impartial committee be appointed by the peace conference, authorized to sit in the cities of Dublin and London, to take testimony as to the alleged facts herein set forth.

None of the members of such committee to be residents or citizens of Great Britain, Ireland, or any of the countries under the domination of Great Britain, or over which that country claims to exercise a protectorate or control.

(b) That a committee of seven be selected immediately in the manner following:

The prime minister of England shall select three members; the elected representatives of Ireland, including Unionists, Nationalists, and Republicans, shall, by a majority vote, select three members of said committee; that the six members thus selected shall agree upon a chairman, who shall be a resident and citizen of the United States, France, or Italy. In case of inability or failure to agree upon a chairman, the selection shall be made by the Supreme Court of the United States. That the Government of Great Britain and the elected members of Parliament from Ireland, as aforesaid, shall each have the right to select its own counsel, to conduct the examination of witnesses and assist in the investigation, the only restriction being that counsel so selected shall be reputable members of the legal profession in good standing in the country of which he or they are citizens.

We sincerely urge that if the peace conference refuses a hearing to the people of Ireland in these circumstances, the guilt for the commission of these monstrous crimes and atrocities, as well as for the bloody revolution which may shortly come, must from this time forward be shared with Great Britain by the members of the peace conference, if not by the peoples whom they represent.

Respectfully submitted.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 6, 1919.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We have the honor to hand you herewith report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference.

On account of the serious and critical situation exposed by the report we beg that you will be good enough to give this document your careful consideration, and also to present the same to the full peace conference or to the committee of the five great powers, whichever may be the proper course under the practice of the conference.

With assurances of our great respect and esteem, we are,

Sincerely,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
E. F. DUNNE.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 6, 1919.

SIR: We have the honor to hand you three copies of document entitled "Report on conditions in Ireland, with demand for investigation by the peace conference," which we have this day transmitted to the President, with copy to Hon. David Lloyd-George, prime minister of England.

In view of the fact that the Senate of the United States is now considering the subject of a new treaty or treaties with the Government of Great Britain, and on account of the further fact that the House of Representatives has heretofore passed a resolution in favor of Ireland's right of self-determination, which has not been acted upon by the peace conference, unless in secret session, of which we have had no advices, we respectfully request that you kindly transmit one copy of this document to the Senate and one to the House of Representatives of the United States, in conformity with the customs and practices of the State Department.

With assurances of our great respect and consideration, we are,

Respectfully,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
E. F. DUNNE.

HON. ROBERT LANSING,
Secretary of State of the United States, Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 6, 1919.

SIR: Complying with your request of May 1, 1919, made through Sir William Wiseman, and assented to by Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, the representatives at Paris of the Irish republican government, that we visit every part of Ireland, and especially Belfast, to ascertain the actual conditions existing in that country.

We have the honor to inform you that we have, except where prevented by the use of the military forces of the English army of occupation, visited the four provinces of Ireland, including Belfast, as well as the other principal cities and towns.

We have prepared a report covering the facts, with certain recommendations.

In order that the Government of Great Britain may be informed, we herewith hand you copy of this report, which, in addition to the presentation of facts, contains a demand for an investigation under the authority of the peace conference.

We also wish to advise your Government that the original of this document has this day been handed to the President of the United States, and that copies have been transmitted to the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, through the Secretary of State.

Respectfully,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.
E. F. DUNNE.

HON. DAVID LLOYD-GEORGE,
Prime Minister of England, Paris.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 8, 1919.

YOUR MAJESTY: We herewith transmit to you our "Report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference," together with copies of letters addressed to your prime minister, Mr. David Lloyd-George.

The original of this report has been delivered to the President of the United States for presentation to the peace conference, and copies have been forwarded to Hon. Robert Lansing, American Secretary of State, for transmission to the Congress of the United States.

Respectfully,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
FRANK P. WALSH, Chairman.

His Majesty GEORGE V,
King of Great Britain, London, England.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 8, 1919.

SIR: Upon the 22d ultimo, during the proceedings in the House of Lords on that date, as published in the London Times, you made a statement, in reply to a question of Viscount Midleton, as to the intentions of the prime minister with reference to giving publicity to the result of the findings of our investigation of conditions in Ireland.

We beg, therefore, to submit to you herewith, for presentation to the House of Lords, this report, together with copies of letter addressed to Hon. David Lloyd-George, Prime Minister.

Respectfully,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,

E. F. DUNNE.

Right. Hon. Lord BIRKENHEAD,
Lord Chancellor of England, House of Lords,
London, England.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 8, 1919.

SIR: Upon the 14th ultimo, during the proceedings in the House of Commons on that date, as published in the London Times, you made an official statement as to the intentions of the prime minister with reference to giving publicity to the result of the findings of our investigation of conditions in Ireland.

We beg, therefore, to submit to you herewith, for transmission to the cabinet, this report, together with copies of letters addressed to His Majesty King George V and Hon. David Lloyd-George, prime minister.

Respectfully,
AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, June 8, 1919.

SIR: We have the honor to hand you herewith "Report on conditions in Ireland with demand for investigation by the peace conference," together with copies of letters addressed to the President of the United States, the American Secretary of State, and the Hon. David Lloyd-George, British prime minister, upon the same subject.

As you are doubtless aware, charges have been made that matters deeply affecting the peace of the world, such as the condition of Ireland, are habitually suppressed by English newspapers. In order that your paper may be thoroughly advised and that there should be no misunderstanding upon the subject later, we take this opportunity to submit the inclosed documents.

Respectfully, yours,

Editor LONDON TIMES,
London, England.

[This report was given publicity in Paris on the morning of June 3, 1919. Inasmuch as the report had the appearance of having been suppressed by all of the London papers except the Daily News and Herald, special copies were forwarded to the editors in London, accompanied by identical letters as above.]

REPLY TO THE STATEMENT OF THE HON. IAN MACPHERSON, CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND, BY FRANK P. WALSH, CHAIRMAN OF THE AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE.

At the request of the Hon. David Lloyd-George, prime minister of England, transmitted by Sir William Wiseman, secretary of the British embassy at Paris, and assented to by Messrs. Sean T. O'Ceallaigh and George Gavan Duffy, envoys of the Irish republic at the peace conference, the American Commission on Irish Independence, represented by Hon. Edward F. Dunne, former governor of Illinois, Michael J. Ryan, of Philadelphia, and myself visited the four Provinces of Ireland, including Dublin, Cork, Belfast, and other large cities, for the purpose of ascertaining existing conditions.

Upon June 3, 1919, the American Commission transmitted its report to the peace conference, at the same moment handing copies to President Wilson, His Majesty King George V, the prime minister of England, and likewise forwarding copies to the Senate of the United States.

The report contained a list of hideous atrocities being practiced upon the people of Ireland by the English army of occupation in Ireland. The report was suppressed by the English censor in Ireland, and the English press initially printed incomplete and garbled accounts thereof.

After a silence of more than two weeks and upon the insistent demand of the English press, notably the London Times, Mr. Ian MacPherson, English Chief Secretary for Ireland, issued a categorical statement confessing many of the charges denying others and making explanations in the nature of avoidance covering many of them. The answer of Mr. MacPherson was editorially denounced by the London Times as halting and evasive; by the London News, Manchester Guardian, and London Herald as containing damaging and shameful admissions of misgovernment and violation of human rights in Ireland.

Upon the 27th of July there was released to the American papers and all of the news agencies an additional answer by Mr. MacPherson to the atrocity charges reported by the American Commission, making sweeping denial of the same.

An issue of fact is thus clearly raised. If the original charges are true, England should be execrated by the liberty-loving people of the world, and Mr. MacPherson must go down in history as not only the prime mover and defender of the unspeakable crimes and cruelties set forth in the report, but as a dishonest and untruthful person. If the charges are untrue, then the signers of the report should be exposed as malicious falsifiers.

The original reports of the American Commission contained the following:

In order that the peace conference may act in the light of knowledge of the conditions and be fully advised as to the effect of England to keep the people of Ireland in subjection by military power and violence in contravention of the principles for which the peace conference was convoked, we respectfully urge the appointment of a commission to ascertain the facts and report the same to the peace conference, and respectfully submit the following alternative suggestions as to its formation and appointment:

(a) That an impartial committee be appointed by the peace conference, authorized to sit in the cities of Dublin and London, to take testimony as to the alleged facts herein set forth.

None of the members of such committee to be residents or citizens of Great Britain, Ireland, or any of the countries under the domination of Great Britain, or over which that country claims to exercise a protectorate or control.

(b) That a committee of seven be selected immediately in the manner following:

The Prime Minister of England shall select three members; the elected representatives of Ireland, including Unionists, Nationalists, and Republicans, shall, by a majority vote, select three members of said committee; that the six members thus selected shall agree upon a chairman, who shall be a resident and citizen of the United States, France, or Italy. In case of inability or failure to agree upon a chairman, the selection shall be made by the Supreme Court of the United States. That the Government of Great Britain and the elected members of Parliament from Ireland, as aforesaid, shall each have the right to select its own counsel, to conduct the examination of witnesses selected, shall be reputable members of the legal profession in good standing in the country of which he or they are citizens.

The latest answer by Mr. MacPherson, published broadcast in America, consists mainly of bald denials, unsupported by any citation to [sic] the military authorities who have first-hand information as to the truth or falsity of the charges, and without informative detailed proof to substantiate the same.

Assuming that England must eventually agree to an impartial court of inquiry substantially along the lines suggested herein, we make offer to prove the following:

ASSAULT UPON PROF. MACNEILL.

In addition to the statements of the investigators who witnessed the assault, we will produce at least 20 impartial persons who saw the assault and who will testify to its brutal nature and the insults which accompanied it.

POLITICAL PRISONERS IN ANIMAL CAGES.

To prove that the prisoners in Mountjoy Prison were exhibited in cages ordinarily used for wild animals, we will produce photographs of the cages unless they have been removed, in which event we will produce at least 50 prisoners who occupied them and a countless number of impartial witnesses who saw them.

VICTIMS RENDERED INSANE.

We will produce the records of the jails and insane asylums, as well as the victims who have recovered, and the relatives of those who have not, to prove our charges that numbers of Irish republicans were rendered insane by their treatment.

PNEUMONIA VICTIMS.

We will produce hospital records, testimony of physicians of the highest standing, as well as intelligent and impartial witnesses who treated and saw the victims while suffering from pneumonia, caused by having cold water thrown upon them from a hose in different prisons, also names and death certificates of those who died from the treatment.

DEAD, WOUNDED, AND DISABLED.

We will produce a list of the dead, those who were permanently maimed and disfigured by the atrocities practiced upon them; also a list of those whose health has been shattered and who have been rendered incurable invalids by their treatment, all accompanied by names and dates.

VIOLENT SUPPRESSION OF LABOR.

We will produce proof that the leaders of the national labor movement have been arrested without being informed of any charge against them, confined in jail in many instances for weeks and months; that while so confined they were treated with extreme harshness and cruelty; that their activities are spied upon by an army of detectives and their meetings infested by agents provocative; that their orderly meetings have been dispersed by the military authorities and violent assaults committed upon the bodies of men and women seeking to carry on the orderly business of their organizations; that permanent machine-gun emplacements have been erected and guns mounted thereon by the military engineers of the Army of Occupation, so that Liberty Hall in Dublin, the headquarters of the Irish National Labor Union, may be subjected to destructive assaults at a moment's notice.

INDISPUTABLE PROOF OF OTHER CHARGES.

These, as well as the other charges in the original and supplemental report of the investigators, we are ready to substantiate not only by the testimony of the victims, but by hundreds of disinterested witnesses, including past and present members of the English Army and Royal Irish Constabulary, who, sickened at the atrocious acts they were called upon to perform and witness, either resigned their commissions or now stand ready to sacrifice their careers in the interest of humanity and justice.

The issue now has been clearly made and formally submitted to the people of the United States and the world by the official reports of the American commission on Irish independence and the formal reply of Hon. Ian MacPherson, chief secretary for Ireland, representing Great Britain in the controversy. We respectfully submit, not only in justice to the character of the signers of our original report, which we assert to have been unjustly and maliciously assailed, but to the cause of a righteous and enduring peace, that unless the English Government quickly agrees to the institution of an impartial court of inquiry by the peace conference its case should go by default and England must stand convicted by thinking mankind as a cruel marauder of human rights and the one remaining Government of the world imposing its rule upon others by force of arms and exploiting weaker peoples by ugly might alone.

FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman American Commission on Irish Independence.

NEW YORK, August 4, 1919.

[Copy of cablegram.]

NEW YORK, August 8, 1919.

IAN MACPHERSON,
Chief Secretary for Ireland,
Dublin Castle, Dublin, Ireland:

Am forwarding you by mail to-day reply to your statement denying facts set forth in report of American commission on Irish independence, dated June 3, 1919, so that you may be advised. Meantime I can not overlook the issue of personal veracity and honor which you have injected into the controversy. This is to inform you that unless you immediately join in request for appointment of impartial committee of inquiry by the peace conference I shall publicly stigmatize you as a falsifier and your answer to our report as a piece of willful mendacity on the part of a high official unparalleled in the field of crooked politics.

FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman American Commission on Irish Independence.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say, of course, Mr. Chairman and Senator FALL, that we will be very glad to accede to whatever is the pleasure of this committee.

Senator JOHNSON of California. We want nothing secret, Mr. Walsh.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is a good idea. Neither do we want anything secret. At the same time, there were certain elements about it that we thought they would prefer to have held confidential.

Senator JOHNSON of California. They were our delegates, were they not?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and we claim, and I presented a legal argument to Secretary Lansing on the position, that they had in no way divested themselves of their official character; that they were sent over there for this purpose; that they not only had the right to attend to the matter in hand, but that they had the right to hear any representative American citizen in any sort of representative capacity that had anything to present. We will be glad to submit these documents under whatever rules you may be pleased to make.

Now, when we went over there we expected to meet this situation: The President had said this fight was for the right of small nations to control their own lives and to govern themselves. He said that the issue was not made by men or women, but was made by events; that this principle was to apply to those whom we did not like as well as to those whom we did like; that there was to be a peace conference at the end of the war, and that that conference was to be composed not of diplomats, as such conferences had been before, not of statesmen, not of governments, but of peoples through their representatives; and so these people, meeting in race convention, a homogeneous people, with their boundaries fixed by God himself, by the sea, a people who had retained their culture through the centuries, a people who had maintained their social institutions in spite of all sorts of repression of armies of occupation—aye, may I say, a people who shed their most precious blood at least once every generation in an attempt to repel the invader who was occupying their country—these people met in race convention and sent us as their representatives to the peace conference, and we believed that when we got there we would find a conference of delegates. These people had held a plebescite in December under the forms of English law, under every disadvantage, so far as they were concerned, and by an overwhelming majority had agreed to come under these principles for which so many of our soldiers died. When they did it they separated from England. They refused to go to Westminster.

They set up their own congress, and I want to say to you gentlemen, because I speak here as an American of America, that I give the American thought when I say as an American of Irish blood that if the great test was put between America and any other nation upon this earth, including the one for which we have so deep a sentimental attachment, that we would see Ireland go to the fathomless depths of the sea and to disappear as compared to our own country; but I want to say to you that when these men separated from England, when this Irish people separated from England, they separated forever. [Applause.] They have a volunteer army of 200,000 trained men, not well equipped, of course, but none will say in this presence that they will not go out with their rude weapons and fight to the death, because men are doing it in India, where women and children are being bombed. They are doing it in Egypt, where villages are being ravaged and people are being killed on the street. They are doing it in 20 different countries, among 20 different groups, at the very time that peace was signed. So we believed that under the declaration of the President of the United States, when we would present our case, we would show that Ireland came strictly within the definition which he gave, and that automatically Ireland would have the right to self-determination. But we found no such body in Paris. We found that 70 men or more had assembled there; that immediately upon assembling they had abrogated all their rights.

They were like the minority stockholders in a corporation that appointed a board of directors, and they appointed a board of directors of 10. The main body had met only four times in session up to the time we left Paris. They appointed a board of directors of 10. That board of directors appointed a committee of four. One of them was found to have no influence and was set aside, so they got down to a committee of three. We found that there was no small nation given a hearing before that board. We found that there was no abstract right contended for by any small nation laid down as the principle of action by that committee of three. And from now on, for the purposes of this argument, we will call them the Big Three instead of the Big Four.

Senator JOHNSON of California. Were you present over there, Mr. Walsh?

Mr. WALSH. Senator, I hung around the Hotel Crillon until I wore out several pairs of shoes.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I want the record to show that you are speaking from personal knowledge.

Mr. WALSH. I am speaking from personal knowledge, and I am putting so much "I" in this case that I do not know whether I am a witness or an advocate or what I am here; but I was there, and the record shows at least the part that I took.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Will you be kind enough to let me ask you a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes, indeed, Senator.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Of how many people did this board of directors, as you call it, consist at the time you were corresponding with them with a view of getting the case of Ireland laid before the peace conference?

Mr. WALSH. There were 10 of the board of directors, but it had vanished down to 3. I am just giving my view of it, of course, as I looked at it at first hand, in a sort of a way. We were Kansas City and Chicago diplomats, not Parisian diplomats. We had to take it as we glanced at it, and we found that committee of three. Of course, Japan could have sat in there, but it was the joke of Paris, "What are the Japs going to do?" The other members were wishing to the Almighty that they would do something besides just sit there and blink; but England had winked at Japan, of course. Japan went in there under that broad plan, the equality of nations, the equal recognition of all nationals; but Japan already had her secret treaty; she already had her understanding. She did not need to be there. What she wanted was to maintain her grasp on Korea and to get Shantung. Of course she dropped out. She was well attended to.

Now, instead of dealing with small nations over there they dealt with reparations; they dealt with indemnities; they divided up territories; they created new nationalities—some of them, I understand, by mistake. They drew lines and sometimes did not know what country some of these nationals were put into. Around that place were all of these peoples trying to get a voice. I believe that had we had a little more practical statesmanship we might have organized the small nations of the world on the principles of the 14 points and started out and won it for the world. I really do [applause]; because the Lithuanians were there, the Arabians were there, the Chinese were there, the Esthonians were there, the Georgia republicans were there, the East Indians were there, and all the others were there. They called at the headquarters of the American commission to find out from us what was the reason why the 14 points were not being applied. So after they finished this work as far as it could be finished—the departure of the President of the United States put an end to it—we applied to the "Big Three." I am not going into our correspondence, but I will say this, that they said that unofficially they loved us, but officially they were ready to jump out of the window when we came in. I do not know what they were afraid of. Surely they were not afraid of England. Let them look at Ireland. Nine hundred soldiers held off 40,000 for over a week. Let them look back to the history of our own country that fought so well against unequal odds. Surely it was not fear. But as I say, unofficially they loved us, but officially, I am sorry to say, I do not believe they liked to see us come into the Crillon Hotel.

In the interviews which we are now to submit under the request of this committee we will give the interviews that we had with all these gentlemen. Our correspondence will show—I want to speak plainly—how they dodged us. It would have been, I may say, more agreeable to us and would have called for our admiration to a greater extent if they had just said, "We don't want to have anything to do with you"; but they did not do that. They recognized us just as far as they could unofficially, and we claim, of course, officially. So when the thing broke up——

Senator BORAH. Mr. Walsh, I suppose there must have been some one, aside from the American delegation, that was objecting to your being heard, was there not?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; let me tell you. Let me say this, Senator BORAH, as it will appear here, that we were prevented from being heard by the representative of George V directly, for this reason, because now as I study this covenant of the league I see many angles that I did not see before, and I recall that when that committee of four went into session to settle the fate of the whole world they agreed that they would not hear anyone except by unanimous consent, and we were the people—that is, the representatives of the Irish race; when I say "we" I mean the representatives of these other races—that had the great concern.

Now, when that committee adjourned by the departure of the President, we for the first time got the league of nations. I say here now, and I want to put it in this record, that that league of nations was never assented to, even by the ones who signed it, in the sense that we understand it. Anyone who was present at the Quay d'Orsai when the covenant of the league of nations was so splendidly and dramatically read by our President, and has seen them jumping up all over the room, wanting to say a word—you could not tell who they were—but Clemenceau, the lion of France, blandly said, "There being no objection, the covenant of the league is agreed to." We used to have what we called mob primaries out in Missouri, and I guess some of you gentlemen had them, where the chair would recognize only one man to appoint a committee of 10 to bring in a list of delegates to attend the convention, and the committee of 10 always returned with a list containing their own names, and then the meeting adjourned. [Laughter.]

Senator BRANDEGEE. You speak of these interviews you had. Did you have a stenographer with you?

Mr. WALSH. No; we did not have a stenographer, but the minute we came away, every time, we dictated to a stenographer what had occurred in the conference; and in the last one, the one with the President, I had a gentleman present who, of course, could be a witness, and there were two of us, Gov. Dunne and myself, and we immediately dictated it, and I do not believe that there will be any dispute about the facts. If so, we would like to appear before this committee again, and perhaps point out logically other things that coincide exactly with what was said in that interview.

Now, as I say, I was for a league of nations such as I have tried to set out here, but I was willing to take a bad league of nations. I was willing to take one that was not a good league of nations. I had gotten the French thought—the thought of France—that this is a rotten covenant for a league of nations; but it is not possible to start unless you have some sort of a league, and you can not have a robust and a good league by strangling it to death in infancy. I had a good deal of that thought. I studied that league covenant coming back on the boat, and having studied that league covenant I say, so far as my limited capacity goes and my ability to understand it, it is not a league of nations to prevent war, but it is a league of nations to foment war; it is a league of nations to put the shackles of injustice on almost half the people of the world; to embroil us in wars and in contests such as our country has never known before.

In order to be plain—it is with regret that I will send my resignation to the League to Enforce Peace coincidentally with the little effort I am making to-day—I hate to say it, but I say that that whole covenant of the league is so shot through with injustice, that the subtle European minds have so covertly and successfully planted their ideals in it in contradiction to the ideals of the American people, that no interpretation and no amendment can make it an honest document. [Applause.]

Now, if I may be indulged for a moment about this league, we have a certain concept. We have been reproached for being a material people. Over there I saw a cartoon that hurt my feelings, portraying America something like Davenport's cartoons used to do, with dollar marks all over Uncle Sam's clothes. We have been criticized for being chasers of the almighty dollar and for not having the high spirit that ought to animate people.

Senator KNOX. That cartoon represented the dollars they wanted.

Mr. WALSH. It represented the dollars they wanted; very good. But that criticism, as I say, is being made, Mr. Senator. Now, we have certain ideals. This Government was founded upon them. We believe that they have not only been good for us, but they have been good for the world. The great contribution that President Wilson made to this war was in his declaration upon going into the war, in the addresses that he made to you gentlemen at different times, and in public; because, as I had the privilege of telling him, when he made those declarations of the right of every man and woman to control their own life destinies, he said what was in the hearts and in the brains of countless millions of people—all of them, practically, except the men who held mastery. He declared principles for which thousands have died what might otherwise have been ignominious deaths upon the scaffold, for which countless millions have served time in jails and penitentiaries; and are doing it, I may add, in Ireland to-day; and when he did it, he gave utterance to the idea that set the world free. By your action in the Senate of the United States you may cause the butchery of many more thousands, but that ideal will live. The people of the world have been made free, and they have been made free by us; and if our temporary servants—or representatives, to be more polite, because we have no rulers—forget those principles, then by the strength of our intellects and by the power given by the Constitution of the United States we will get new servants and other representatives who will carry those principles to their final consummation. [Applause.]

I will only try to urge the fundamentals of this plan.

Senator FALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the time of the hearing be extended indefinitely, until it is concluded.

Senator NEW. I second that motion.

Senator FALL. It is the first chance that the American people have had for a hearing anywhere, as I understand, except in the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. I do not like to take the time.

Senator FALL. Go on.

Senator MOSES. Let us have the question, Mr. Chairman.

Senator BORAH. We have got 25 days.

Mr. WALSH. I have all the rest of my life.

Senator JOHNSON of California. And so have the rest of us, too.

Senator MOSES. May we have a vote on this motion, Mr. Chairman?

Senator FALL. I make that motion, that the time be extended three hours—extended more, if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is that the time be extended three hours.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Before we vote on that let me ask——

The CHAIRMAN. I want to say to the committee that we arranged to hear the Greeks to-day and to give them an hour, and as they have come here from a long distance, I feel bound to give them that hearing.

Senator FALL. The three hours additional need not necessarily be consecutive. They may take their hour and then we may continue this hearing, which is very interesting to me.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. There is no need of a motion for that.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I simply wanted to ask Judge Cohalan if he wanted three hours more.

Judge COHALAN. We would like it very much. Mr. Ryan gave way, and he has first-hand information. Gov. Dunne gave way. We would like very much to give them an opportunity to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. We can hear the Greeks this afternoon, but of course it would involve a break in your hearing. We can take it up later.

Mr. WALSH. I am going to close as quickly as I possibly can. There are a few things I would like to say yet.

The CHAIRMAN. Take your time, Mr. Walsh. The committee are ready to hear you. [Applause.]

Seantor FALL. Mr. Chairman, had we not better settle this by voting on my motion for three hours' additional hearing? Then we can take a recess and hear the Greeks later.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. I think we can give them all the time they want.

Senator FALL. I will move to extend the time again if they have not completed.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee can arrange that. We have other hearings, and of course we must maintain our engagements.

Senator JOHNSON of California. We can run these hearings into next week.

Senator BORAH. We can go ahead, and if nobody calls time on them, they will not need to stop.

Senator FALL. Nobody will call time on them.

The CHAIRMAN. I will try and make an arrangement with the Greeks for their hearing in the meantime.

Mr. WALSH. I will try as well as I can to address myself to what I call the fundamentals of this proposed covenant of the league of nations, to give you if I can what is in my mind and what is in my conscience, because I will say again what I feel impelled to say, that this whole covenant of the league of nations is a perversion of what the men who really favored a league of nations intended and wished for.

Senator HARDING. Before you get away from it, I would like to have you emphasize and give us a little more light on one thing: You expressed the surprise of the assembled commissioners over the league when it was presented.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Senator HARDING. Was that marked?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, it was very marked. They jumped up all over the place to make protests. Man after man got up. You know there was an awful censorship upon this whole business. We followed the publicity very closely, on account of our own little embassy over there. It was impossible at that time to get anything about Ireland in a French paper. I am very happy to say that since the Persian matter and since the developments at the White House conference and other places a very distinctly different reaction is going on in Paris. Our cable advisers tell us that the most reactionary papers in Paris are in favor of the absolute independence of Ireland and think that Ireland was badly treated at the peace conference, and looked to this Senate not to give any advice and never to consent to the covenant of the league of nations as it is at present.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Will you allow me to ask you a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. At the time this covenant was accepted by the plenary conference was there any attempt to elucidate its provisions, to explain the various provisions in it, or any debate upon it, other than the formal set speeches of the heads of the nations which presented it to the conference?

Mr. WALSH. Not a particle. It had been presented before, and there were some objections made to certain parts of it, and it went back and this meeting was called, and I talked to one of the most powerful members of the conference outside of the Big Four. He is a lawyer of very fine ability. As we are going in to have everything open, I will say that it was Judge Doherty, of Canada, representing the Dominion of Canada, and the night before he did not know what was in it.

Senator MOSES. He was one of the signatories to the treaty, was he not?

Mr. WALSH. He was a signatory to the treaty.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I would like to have you or some other gentleman who speaks for your side of the question state why this covenant can not by amendment be made satisfactory. I understand you to say that it is such a dishonest document that it can not be made honest by amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I say that. I do not mean personal dishonesty.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I understand that.

Mr. WALSH. I mean intellectually dishonest.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Such an undesirable thing for the United States to agree to.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I want either you or some other gentleman who addresses us to explain, in view of article 26, which provides that amendments to this covenant shall take effect when ratified by the members of the league whose representatives compose the council, and by a majority of the members of the league whose representatives compose the assembly, why under that article it can not be amended satisfactorily. I ask you that question in view of the fact that one of the strongest arguments contained in the letters which I receive in favor of the covenant is that, although the covenant has its imperfections, no human document can be expected to be perfect when it originates, that the Constitution of the United States was not perfect, and that it was afterwards amended very quickly, and that therefore this league covenant can be amended satisfactorily if we will only go into it. I want you to give your reasons why you say it can not.

Mr. WALSH. Very good; I will try to answer that, Senator. First, I look upon this document in this way: It is either a thoroughgoing fraud from beginning to end, to which a respectable nation should not give its assent; it is either something gotten up intentionally and deliberately to deceive, or else it has either the direct power or the potential power to enforce every idea in it. That is my opinion of this document.

I believe, if we surrender to this proposed covenant of the league of nations, that in the very essentials of its structure, we can never escape.

I begin by my opposition to article 10, and, as I suggested, not limiting it as far as Ireland is concerned, but that it should apply to any country that had the fate of the people in its hands, and had determined the form of government under which it should live and which government was oppressed by an army of occupation. I think it could be amended. But as you go through this, as has been said, 11 is just as bad as 10, and 12 is just as bad as 11, and you go a little further and you will find that 13 is as bad as 11, because if a dispute arose, and believe me, gentlemen, a dispute is going to arise about Ireland mighty quickly, and a dispute is going to arise about other matters as far as France is concerned, and if this committee has the power—and this committee has the power if it is a fair document and not a false document—it has the authority to lay down the procedure from which we can never escape. And I took section 40 of the annex, because my first criticism was answered by a gentleman very high in authority who said that this vote had to be unanimous, the vote of the assembly, but I found under section 40 of the annex that a majority vote, a bare majority of the council, carries any proposition with it. And when it comes to arbitrament of these nations, they know exactly what they want under this treaty, and will never agree to arbitration, and it goes to this council stacked in advance. I want to speak plainly—why? Because they have secret agreements entered into and signed by the representatives of the United States dividing territory, and unless the chairman has received them since I heard the argument on the case of Egypt the other day, they are still undisclosed to the separate branch of the treaty-making power, the Senate of the United States, and certainly not to our knowledge.

The CHAIRMAN. Most things connected with this treaty are undisclosed.

Mr. WALSH. I would say now, if we are doing it all open, as soon as you get the agreement mentioned by Senator FALL, that you send it to us that we may find out if Ireland is in it.

Senator BORAH. You were speaking about article 40?

Mr. WALSH. Article 40 of the annex.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You have not the committee print?

Mr. WALSH. I think I can find it.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did you mean a majority of the council or of the assembly?

Mr. WALSH. A majority vote of the council decides the whole thing.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I wish you would read that provision.

Mr. WALSH. All right. I think I can find it. It is in the annex. It is chapter 3, article 40.

Senator MOSES. That relates to the Saar Valley.

The CHAIRMAN. Top of page 93, article 40, section 4.

Senator SWANSON. That relates to the Saar Basin, section 4.

Mr. WALSH. I think not, as I read it. Let us consider it, because I tried to weigh it with great care, and I weighed this with reference to what this council might interpret it to mean. Now, the league contains a great many of the ideals expressed by the President, but still I will say that an analysis of that will show that in some place there is something that points out that this is not a covenant that is going to bring peace to the world.

I get this from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We have the covenant and then we have the annex.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Just give the page and the date of the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Page 2344 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, July 10, 1919. That was my first notion when I read it, that it referred to the Saar Valley, but I do not believe that it does.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I want you to put it in the record of the hearing of this committee.

Mr. WALSH. I am going to put it in the record, and then try to give you what follows, that makes me say that the interpretation of this can be made to show that it refers to the whole annex.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Take your time and find it.

Senator BORAH. I suggest that the gentleman proceed and that when he has time to look this up he can add it to his remarks.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Senator MOSES. In other words, he will present a brief on it?

Senator BORAH. No; he can present his remarks. We will stay here until he gets through.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I will find the clause in there, if that refers to the whole annex, and I think it does.

Senator SWANSON. If you will look at page 67 of the annex, it is named "Annex." Then it concludes.

On page 93, here is the way section 40 reads [reading]:

"In all matters dealt with in the present annex the decision of the council of the league of nations will be taken by a majority."

On page 67, if you will read through—it is named "Annex"—it shows that all that in the annex is limited to a majority.

Mr. WALSH. I did not so get it out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I will try to come back to it. I took this CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in my analysis and that is my conclusion. I will come back to that.

Now, then, to begin with, fundamentally I say that the setting up of this assembly and council absolutely pushes us away not only from the ideas of our Government, but surrenders us in this way to the conception of monarchy as opposed to a republican form of government.

We were present, as I say, in Paris. We were there at the time when all of the experts were resigning. We were there at the time when all of Paris understood that the ideals for which we entered the war had been circumvented. We were there and heard the secret treaties discussed. We were there and heard not only the facts, but the intelligent men and women from many of the struggling nationalities, and all of them drawing the point of departure from democracy to autocracy or monarchy just as I am going to try to draw it here.

We start with this council, which consists of the representative of the American Republic, the minister of the King of England, the minister of the King of Italy, the minister of the Emperor of Japan, the minister of the King of Belgium, the minister of the King of Spain, the minister of the King of the Helenes, and the representative of the Republic of France, essentially different in form, of course, from our own, and the representative from the Republic of Brazil. So we started out with a monarchical institution essentially to pass upon all questions the council of the proposed league of nations has the right to pass upon.

We find as we look through this treaty, first, that the nations are not disarmed. We find that we are entering into obligations ourselves to increase our armament. We find that we are under a practical obligation to increase our armament fivefold. We find that under the authority—and I am speaking of it now as absolute authority—that this is a virile living thing that is intended to effectuate its purpose, with all the influence and power that can be put behind it by all of the powerful nations of the earth, and it is that sort of institution.

Senator HARDING. You have noted that the President has said that we really have no obligation except to pass upon the orders of the council in accordance with the conception of justice.

Mr. WALSH. I have followed that, and in my slight study of metaphysics it is too deep for me. I read it over and over again and tried to put it in the blunt way I have by saying that this is a document of liberty and power or it is an essential fraud; that if we admit there is such a thing as international law, under international law it must have all the force that any other agreement has between nations or it has not any at all. That is my conception of it, and I give it for what it is worth.

Now as long as we are a powerful nation and as long as the signatories with us have work to do for their kind of an imperialistic character in the world so long will they carry America along with them. If we furnish the men, if we furnish the treasure, if we spill the blood—and it must be done at once, as I will try to show before I leave my remarks—then we go along with our fellow imperialists and we are full imperialist criminals with them. But if our one man on that league of nations decides that we will not go on, then it will be found that we did not need this large army, that we will drop under a pledge that we have made to allow the council to set the quantity of disarmament or armament that may be had. We will then drop down into a small armed country. Why? Because it is not necessary to police our country. Why? Because if we refuse as a matter of fact to join with them in their imperialistic aggressions, and they have the power under it to allow Germany—we conjure hatred with that name of old, and so I mention it—if we admit Germany afterwards into the league, then England could right away have a standing army or navy to conquer any country that they desired to keep under subjection or to place under subjection, while we would have a small army if they disarmed us on land and disarmed us on sea, and we might have a navy half as large as England's, and she could have a navy twice as large as she has at the present time.

And so I might go through this document. I will be glad to do it. It can be done. But I know you gentlemen have done it. I would do it if I had the power, which I doubt.

If this is not a covenant for a league of nations, what is it? Can there be any dispute about it? It is a so-called covenant of a league of nations proclaimed to the world, and honestly by its advocate—by its only advocate, who I believe has followed this thing through, because there is a propaganda going on in this country such as there never has been before. On Broadway, New York, I heard a Government official connected with the Educational Department in Washington. May I without offense to the gentleman say that he has never read this league of nations covenant. But he had a crowd around him and was speaking for it to the people of the United States. I saw another man speaking for it and asking his organization to indorse. I know this gentleman has not read it.

It is called a covenant of the league of nations. It is a catchword. It first caught my consciousness. It is a catchword, and that will bring behind it those who abhor war and those who believe that some start ought to be made with a league of nations. But the truth ought to be written that it is a league to effectuate and maintain permanently the divisions of territory, and the seizing of the lives of men and women as contained in secret treaties about which the President of the United States knew nothing when he made these utterances, about which he knew nothing when he went to Paris, and about which we knew nothing; and for the upholding and maintaining of the principles of which 300,000 of our men were killed, gassed, and wounded in foreign lands, which can not be denied here. I have read the questions asked by Senators BORAH and JOHNSON. It is in the minds of all of you that when that Big Three sat, there were three dominating thoughts. One was a man of ideals—of honest ideals. I say that I believe that if our President could have come back to this country with every one of them put in force, his heart's greatest desire would have been met. I believe that. But when he got there, as he expressed it, he had in mind all of the principles for which we had gone to war, an end of secret diplomacy, an end of back-door intrigue, an end of the power of one man to get into a squabble with another and call to arms millions of people, the young manhood of the country that he happens to represent, that there was to be an end to this thing of dividing territory regardless of the wishes of the people, that always and ever the rights of nationalities were to be considered, that always and ever no man hereafter should have a government imposed upon him that his conscience did not approve of, but he found that secret treaties had been made absolutely abrogating every one of his 14 points. What became of the freedom of the seas?

The recognition, if you give it—and I trust in God you will not—to England's protectorate over Egypt means that England takes Turkey's right to the Suez Canal; means, if I conjure the thought correctly, that it gives England a grip on every quart of salt water in the world; this country, attempting to enforce ideals, laying down what is contained in some parts of the present proposed league of peace, the present covenant. On the other hand, what do we have? I must state it plainly. I do not believe from my observation that the French people as a people have imperialistic aims. You can not get the thought or the reaction, I believe, that would convince you of that. At any rate, I believe that so intent were they particularly upon getting reparation for the devastation of their country, so anxious were they to have guaranties for their future protection, and so insistent was this demand, that it became, as the President said, a state of mind, and nothing else, so far as France was concerned, could be considered; and so all the press of France sounded that one note; and so everything was censored that might have anything to do with the enforcement of our ideals as expressed in the messages to Congress, in the writings and speeches of the President.

On the other hand was the representative of the King of Great Britain, Mr. Lloyd-George. He held his eyes to high heaven and said that England had no imperialistic aim in the war; that they did not propose to gain one yard of territory. And when they were urging us into the war, you remember how he denounced—how Mr. Asquith denounced—what they called the lie of the enemy, that they had any desire for any territorial aggrandizement. But Mr. Lloyd-George was there, and there for that purpose alone. He emerged with his mandatories or with his protectorates or whatever you call them; and I point to them and I point to Egypt and I point to Ireland, and I say, whatever they call them, they are always the same—and I say that at the very foundation of it, it is the desire and the purpose to economically subject the people of those countries; to keep them in practical slavery—the producing masses of those countries. The people who produce the cotton in Egypt are not allowed to manufacture the goods into textiles in their own country, but are compelled to send the raw material to England. If England did not get that economic advantage, as they have in Ireland and as they have in every country into which they have gone, she would have no concern in going in there.

I have no hatred of England. I am proud of her achievements where they have been good. But I say in the very genesis of the imperialist idea is corruption, the very thought of holding their people for economic advantage is, governmentally and internationally, if you enter into it, dishonesty.

Now, then, she emerged with an added control over something like 33,000,000 people, with an area in land, and valuable land, gold mines, diamond mines, the richest agricultural land existing in the world, in her own bag. Did she do it honestly and fairly? Can any league be a good league that has this honestly as its genesis? Was it fair, I ask—was it fair, gentlemen of this committee, let me ask—to take the lives of our 300,000 men or to cripple them; was it right to accept our aid under the declaration we made; was it right to accept our aid after Lloyd-George and Asquith had declared that they wanted no more territory, when they absolutely had the obligation so far as it could be international to hold that territory, and when they had in their minds that they would do exactly what they did do with the representative of the United States—that instead of following out the principles for which we entered the war they would get an agreement including among its signatories our powerful country, with its great resources, to effectuate and to keep forever what they had already gotten, a territory five times larger than the thirteen original States of the United States? As I say, I do not care what they call it, a mandatory or what not; they have it, and by force of arms and by the help that they think we can give them, they are going to keep it.

I would like at this point to try to direct a few observations, that may again be an answer to what Senator BRANDEGEE asked, as to the constitution, the constituent elements, of this league of nations, and the way it is being gotten up. Some place in the world there is a committee of seven men. I do not know whether there is a democrat upon it—I mean a democrat in its wide sense. I do not know whether there is a man on it that believes in the representative form of government. Has this committee been given a name—a committee to organize a league of nations? Very well, some place there is a committee sitting in the world. It may consist——

Senator JOHNSON of California. Did anybody on this committee know that that authority had been given?

Mr. WALSH. I think Senator FALL knew it.

Senator FALL. I knew it.

The CHAIRMAN. When I shook my head, I meant that I did not know the names. We know some of the people on it by reference to the newspapers.

Mr. WALSH. I have observed them. They all have been published.

The CHAIRMAN. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. WALSH. Some place sitting in the world there is a committee whose personnel is unkown in toto to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee. That committee has this important duty, if you do not know——

Senator FALL. Among its other duties, it has to control the agenda.

Mr. WALSH. They not only put down the primary organization, but they named the agenda for the first meeting.

The CHAIRMAN. And they also arranged the personnel and the officers of the league.

Mr. WALSH. They have gone even further than that, anticipating that the Senate would not perform its duty under the Constitution and advise against this if they thought that it was wrong. You will refuse to give your consent to it if you believe as I do about it. Anticipating that, Sir Eric Drummond was appointed first secretary general.

I want to say to you gentlemen who, I know, have had large experience in constituting boards and bodies, that a general secretary with the power that Sir Eric Drummond has, will have more influence upon the conduct of that board than will a majority of the members. I say that because he has the ability to and he will make the suggestions as to the agendum. He is the one who will receive the protests of people who claim they are being subjected or repressed. He is the one at first hand who passes primarily upon every act that that committee will be called upon to perform. So I say, knowing the little that I do about constituting boards, and in cases where they are brought from different parts of our own country that a general secretary of a board composed of different-speaking people from all over the world is the man who will control that body, practically, if not absolutely.

At the present time there are peoples subject to restrictions in all of the countries of the world. As I heard detailed to you the other day, the officers of the Government of Egypt have the right, so far as I can see, to be diplomatically represented in this or any other nation on earth. They showed me their papers, and they came from their own State Department, and they did not need to be viséed by Great Britain. They came to Paris. They were shocked when they came there to find that two days before they arrived the President of the United States had given out an interview in which he recognized the protectorate of England over Egypt, and adjured the people of Egypt not to commit any violence or do anything that would cause pain and suffering to the inhabitants. And these men, precluded from any effort to get into the conference, spent the balance of their time attempting to see the President of the United States, and before he left he advised Saad Pasha Zagloul that it would be impossible on account of lack of time to see him. This covenant is set up under the direction of Sir Eric Drummond in the United States. How is Saad Pasha Zagloul to come in? How is he to get in the building when he could not get in the country?

A BYSTANDER. How did the Irish get in?

Mr. WALSH. Because the Irish people had the spirit, because those Irishmen knew the genius of our country, knew that no mere prohibitory law with reference to criminals could keep a man out of there who was making a fight for liberty. That is how de Valera got in. That is the spirit that brought him in. The people of Ireland have representatives. They have sent their envoys, sent by the regular government of Ireland, to Paris. They have to go there on some specious plea or on disregard for some restrictive statute or ordinance or regulation. The Egyptians are a great people. There are many millions of people there crying out against the dominion which they despise, in order to come into the league of nations. How did they get into the building? The answer is how did they get into the country? I have said, and I say again, that there should be no pretense that we are going to hear anyone or that we are going to have any part in European affairs if the right of every decent man to come and go freely across the earth's surface is not accorded to him, holding him strictly amenable to the laws of every country in which he may be, whether those laws are to his liking, good or bad. But we can not talk about having an international body where we have restrictive laws that would keep the men that are trying to get a voice for their people from freely attending the place where the conference is to be held.

Mr. Chairman and Senators, this question, of course, to my mind, is not an Irish question. I want to say to you that the people of Ireland are better acquainted with our laws and our customs and the interpretation of our Constitution than any other people on earth, and I say that without boasting, and they are convinced that this league of nations would not only not furnish them any help, but would be absolutely destructive to their efforts for independence, and that they would not get their independence at all until the next war between half and half of the world was settled and democracy finally triumphs. That is the answer to the question.

What did we find there? We went through Ireland; we visited it. They have separated from England. They have set up a government of their own. There is an English censorship that does not allow news to get out. We got there, and what happened in Ireland? We have it in that blue book, Gov. Dunne and myself. It can be backed up by a wealth of evidence that will make every assertion so clear that even Mr. MacPherson, the chief secretary for Ireland, could not deny it. We challenged them to appoint a committee of their own to investigate conditions in Ireland. Why? Not that we would embroil the United States in any contest that Ireland is having, but in order that you may do nothing that will make the chains stronger upon Ireland.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Did you read the speech that Senator WALSH of Montana made in the Senate the other day, in which he claimed that the only hope for the Irish cause was in the league of nations.

Mr. WALSH. I did not have the pleasure of reading that. There is so much being published now that I can not read it all, but I say this: I respectfully differ from the conclusions arrived at by Senator WALSH. As I say, I just came from Ireland. Those are intelligent people over there. We have referred to the small nations, and I say that it warms my American heart to see the way those people clamored around our headquarters. It was a sort of headquarters for the oppressed people of the earth. They have an idea that the President's 14 points are absolutely in the hearts of our people. They have an idea, and have it very strongly, that in some way there is some power that is never going to allow this division of territory to be made. So we met these people; some of them splendid people. They are called backward and subject peoples, and small, and all those diminutive names. We found a state of war going on in Ireland. They have a volunteer army of 200,000. They have their officers. They drill daily, practically all of them are mobilized, and they have their maneuvers. The effort to repress them is an effort of force. We ought to understand this thing and look at it plainly. We heard about the so-called murders, and I shall try to classify them. Reference has been made to the constables. They are not constables such as we know. They are members of a standing army. They carry rifles, and they drill with rifles. They have machine guns. They live in barracks as soldiers do. They are never residents of the community in which they operate as constables.

So they are soldiers. They act under the direct command of the commander in chief of the English army of occupation in Ireland. They took prisoners; the prisoners they took are republican volunteer soldiers, and they were taken, not as assassins but in broad daylight, in the large cities of Ireland.
